The "Kallikak Family," by H. H. Goddard, Ph. D., is a most interesting contribution to this branch of medical science. We note that the physical and other characteristics of Deborah, the feeble-minded descendant of which we shall here speak, from the admission blank kept at the institution for feeble-minded, in New Jersey, to which she was committed, were not those of an idiot or imbecile of low grade, but rather typically those of the Moron, a term descriptive of a large class who are more or less mentally or morally defective, and who always have a bad family history. In Deborah's case, her grandfather was an habitual drunkard and her grandmother deficient, mentally and morally.

Morons have far more mentality and are much more susceptible to the training and instruction of the modern school and institution for the care of feeble-minded than are the idiot or imbecile class, as is shown by the fact that, in the present case of Deborah Kallikak; she, while morally deficient, was quite capable of learning certain things and of doing much clever handiwork. She, after some years of training, learned the alphabet and how to count and to read. She learned to draw and write and to sing and play on the piano. But in such cases the limitations for moral and mental growth are well defined, and she must, therefore, remain a child all her life, under the strict care and custody of good men and members of her own sex, a burden to the race and the State.

It will be apparent, from even the most casual study of this subject and of the chart, that society at large must definitely act in this regard, both for its own preservation and for the preservation of the taxpayers of the country.

My bill (H. R. 19544) to exclude from this country the hordes of insane and degenerates, by penalizing the steamships and common carriers who bring them in, is an important step in the right direction and should at the earliest possible date be reenacted by the Senate and House of Representatives and approved by the Chief Executive. A similar bill, introduced by Senator DILLINGHAM, has already passed the Senate, and it is understood that President Taft fully approved of this provision as an amendment to the general immigration bill vetoed by him.

STERILIZATION AND CASTRATION.

Another most important sociological, scientific, and constitutional phase of this whole subject is the suggestion, widely discussed of late, of the wisdom of sterilizing certain classes of insane criminals and degenerates, both male and female, and thus accomplish the desired result for the present good of the country and for protection mentally, morally, and physically of unborn generations.

I can not cite a better or more practical authority on this subject than my friend Frank Wade Robertson, M. D., professor in Cornell Medical College, New York City, and formerly superintendent of the New York State Reformatory at Elmira, who, writing in American Medicine, July, 1910, says in an article on the "Sterilization of the Criminal Unfit":

> Personally I see in vasectomy a way of escape from this appalling economic and social menace and to the end of creating public sentiment in its behalf I shall make unremitting effort. Can we afford to have divided ranks in our opinion? The attitude of the profession (medical) will largely determine what can be accomplished. By energetic and concerted action we will win, by indifference and indecision we will fail. As a profession this is an opportunity for us to accept or reject. Personally I am committed to vasectomy.

Vasectomy is a rather simple procedure in surgery, and means in the male the ligation or cutting out of a piece of the vas deferens, a duct conducting the vitalizing sexual fluid from the testicles. The operation can be done without necessarily employing anesthesia, and does not even confine to bed, and is, of course, radically different from the more serious operation of castration.

In the female criminal and degenerate either oophorectomy or the removal of the ovaries is practiced, or in its stead salpingotomy, the removal of the oviducts or Fallopian tubes.

So far as I can ascertain, sterilization by vasectomy in certain cases is practiced under recently enacted laws in the States of Indiana and Connecticut. California provides for asexualization, and in Oregon a bill providing for vasectomy was vetoed by the governor. In Illinois a bill passed the senate only. The State of Washington recently provided "operation for the prevention of procreation" upon those convicted of certain crimes; and in New Jersey, Ohio, Utah, and the Province of Ontario, Canada, bills have been introduced providing for sterilization of confirmed criminals, which should include also certain other anthropologis and late degenerates, whether or not convicted of crime.

SPEECH

OF

HON. JOHN J. KINDRED,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 6, 1913,

On the resolution (H. Res. 813) requesting the Secretary of State to furnish information relative to alleged atrocities in the rubber fields of Peru.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Speaker, in connection with House resolution No. 813, requesting the Secretary of State to furnish information relative to alleged atrocities in the rubber fields of Peru, offered by me and referred to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, I desire to call attention to certain facts involved in this matter.

Extending over a period of over two years, from January, 1911, to the present time, the British and American daily press and other publications have frequently printed more or less startling accounts of almost unbelievable and hideous cruelties alleged to have been practiced by the agents of the Peruvian Amazon Co. (Ltd.), an English corporation, on the native Indians of the Putumayo rubber district, along the Putumayo River, eastern Peru, South America. To a casual reader these reports might have appeared so sensational because of the monstrous cruelties alleged as to be worthy of only passing attention. Just as there is truth in the old saying that "where there is so much smoke there must be some fire," these persistent, if seemingly highly colored, reports from the Putumayo rubber fields, on careful investigation, seem to be justified in the main.

Let us examine the many reports and the basis for them, first having clearly in mind some of the main facts which gave rise to them, as they are set forth in the September, 1912, number of the American Review of Reviews; the London Truth, September 22, 1912, and following numbers; Current Literature, September, 1912; the Outlook, September 7, 1912; Littell's Living Age; and other periodicals and numerous English and American dailies.

To quote in part from an article on this subject from September, 1912, number of the American Review of Reviews, the production of rubber here is accompanied by appalling barbarism, in which "man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn."

The article in part reads as follows:

> Two items of news in the London journals in the middle of August last, apparently unconnected, have come to compliment each other in the international politics of international business. On July 13 it was announced that an appropriation had been made by the Brazilian National Congress for the establishment of a valorization of rubber similar to that already effected in the coffee industry. An account was also given of the widespread indignation in England over a report, then made public by the foreign office, on certain hideous cruelties practiced in the rubber district of the Putumayo. The Peruvian Amazon Co. (Ltd.), an English concern, has been collecting rubber in the district since 1907. Several years ago a disclosure of atrocities in this region was made by Sir Roger Casement. This British Government officer, who some years before had startled the world with a report of atrocities in the Congo, had been sent to investigate the situation in Peru. His report was submitted to Sir Edward Grey, the British foreign secretary, in January, 1911, and made public last month. The delay in giving the matter out, it is now stated, was due to the desire of Great Britain to "privately persuade the Peruvian Government to punish the criminals and to prevent a repetition of the atrocities."

The Indian natives of the Putumayo are usually described as a mild, inoffensive people, split up into a number of tribes whose languages differ widely. They number about 10,000. According to the well-authenticated report of Sir Roger Casement, these natives have been subjected to tortures which baffle description, partly for commercial motives to compel them to bring in larger quantities of rubber and partly, it would seem, out of the sheer lust of cruelty. It appears that thousands of natives have been maimed and murdered with impunity, since the district itself has never had proper police protection. The Putumayo, as it is known, already produced a large and increasing proportion of the rubber of South America. The Peruvian Amazon Co., which has no title to the territory, does not allow anyone to enter this territory where it has the sole privilege of buying and selling all sorts of merchandise and products.

It does not permit the Indians who work for it to buy from other except the company store. In exchange for the privileges granted it, the company was supposed to police its own territory, and it was hoped by the Peruvian Government that the English patrols would act as a first line of defense in case the Government of Colombia should renew its effort, made some years ago, to obtain this coveted and disputed territory. At the time of going to press with this issue, the Colombian consul general in New York asserted, in a letter to the press, Colombia's ownership of all lands between the Putumayo and the Caqueta Rivers.

The publication of the Casement report, with the mass of official and diplomatic correspondence covering more than a year, indicates that the British Government's patience is at last at an end. The press in England has been calling for a prosecution of the company and justice to the native. The Peruvian minister at Washington, commenting upon the Casement report, has stated that the atrocities were committed not later than the year 1907, and insists that "things are very different now since the Peruvian Government is in entire control of the Putumayo district."

On the other hand, the official statement of the British foreign office notes that rubber is still being exported from Peru at a rate only possible by a system of forced labor. Speaking in the House of Commons on August 1, Sir Edward Grey declared that his Government was "keeping in the closest touch with the United States Government in this matter." The preceding is from an authentic source, and is confirmed not only by the exhaustive report of Sir Roger Casement but by Judge Romulo Paredes, one of the few white men who have traveled over the 90,000 sparsely settled square miles of this rubber district, and who made a recent visit to other important trading posts and Indian settlements, and who was appointed by the Peruvian Government to make a report on this subject. He is also a wealthy merchant and the proprietor of the leading newspaper in Iquitos, a post on the Amazon River and the nearest city to the Putumayo region. He asserts the Monroe doctrine may be used to serve private corrupt interests.

Paredes's report is in part as follows:

The Putumayo region is one of the least-known parts of the world. It extends from 1 north latitude to 3 south latitude and from 70 east longitude to 76 east longitude. It is covered with equatorial forests practically inaccessible to white men. There are neither railroads nor ordinary roads across the jungle, and the only means of communication are a few navigable tributaries of the Amazon. A glance at the map of the Putumayo, however, will show that those rivers are not very useful to Peru as means of penetrating into the rubber lands. Their course is practically parallel to that of the Amazon until they reach the Brazilian territory.

Policing such an immense wilderness, inhabited by some 10,000 uncivilized aborigines, is an arduous task. Evidence is not easy to gather, especially when you take into account that the natives are divided up into seven main tribes speaking as many unrelated languages and a few local dialects besides.

After several months of investigation, I finally ascertained the names of many individuals, most of them English subjects, guilty of atrocious crimes against the Indians. One of them—Donald Francis—had done things which the spoken word can not easily describe, and was dealt with in accordance with the criminal law of Peru. Terrible charges were made also against one Armando Normand, a Bolivian, and Lavy, a man from Barbados. Both, however, had escaped before our mission reached the Putumayo. Thirty-five foremen from Barbados were also implicated in the atrocities. Unfortunately the English company, informed of our coming, had supplied those criminals with transportation either to Barbados or to Colombia or Brazil, where they were perfectly safe. Peru has no extradition treaties with those two Republics.

The 21 constables whom the Peruvian Government kept in the Putumayo in those days had been all bribed by the English traders and shut their eyes to what was happening in the jungle.

If the Peruvian Government had been informed of the way in which the English rubber merchants were abusing the privileges granted to them, it would have long ago taken strenuous measures to stop those crimes. You must not imagine that the Indians are any less protected than the white people in Peru. The proportion of white people is only 17 per cent, and they do not constitute by any means a privileged class. Fifty-seven per cent of our people are native Indians and the remaining 26 per cent are half breeds. Barring, of course, the times of the early Spanish conquerors, the native Indians have been treated very humanely in Peru.

Collecting rubber is very hard work; scientific tapping gives only about 20 pounds of rubber a year, and the trees are worked in estradas of 100 trees, sometimes scattered over an area of 100 acres. The collecting cups must be emptied every day and the late sap treated as soon as gathered. Every fortnight the natives bring their output to the trading posts and receive, or are supposed to receive, from $9 to $15 for 100 pounds of rubber, according to quality. In the Putumayo region, however, the Amazon Rubber Co. has a monopoly of the sale of merchandise, and the Indians are generally compelled to accept in payment for their fortnightly output of rubber the various goods imported by the company upon which the traders place fanciful valuations. The result of this system of trading is that the Indians finally become indebted to the company and are forcibly taken from their villages and transported to places where labor is scarce. Many tribes have preferred to abandon their territories and homes and move long distances across the equatorial jungle rather than to be set to work for the rubber merchants.

Sir Roger Casement, appointed by Sir Edward Grey, the British foreign secretary of foreign affairs, to go to the Putumayo region to investigate these charges, is by character and training in South American diplomatic affairs well equipped for this important work, which he commenced in the summer of 1910, making his first report to the British foreign office in January, 1911, and many other reports covering a period of over two years, and ending with a final report of nearly 200 pages in June, 1912, which I have examined carefully.

According to these reports, the natives—men, women, and children—are flogged until they die of shock, or surviving they carried maggots in their flesh for months as a result of infection from the lash applied by agents of the rubber company. Indeed, this was a milder form of the numerous forms of excessive tortures practiced, such as burning, shooting, dashing out the brains of the helpless infants, cutting off the heads of all classes of natives, etc., after mutilating them in inconceivable ways. (Pp. 81 et seq., the reasons assigned.)

Investigation shows that it is also the contention of Peru that the English Rubber Co. was solely responsible for these atrocities.

I have purposely omitted here sensational American and British newspaper articles detailing the most horrible cruelties, but have compiled my quotations from the most reputable sources.

I am at a loss to understand why we as a world power and humane Nation, realizing the "white man's burden," should not at least keep up with England's examples in this direction. We being charged, as England is not, with grave responsibility in the South American Republics, should at least make as strong diplomatic representations to Peru as England has done, in order to best exert our greater moral influence in this serious matter—an influence quite sufficient, I believe, to diminish or totally abolish these atrocities among the helpless Peruvian Indians—which exceed in their excessives the conditions that existed in the African Kongo region in the worst reign of slavery there of the late King Leopold and his Belgium rubber syndicates.

A somewhat vague allusion is made by Secretary of State Knox to the possible propriety of our Government making such diplomatic representations in this matter in his letter of May 24, 1912, to Mr. Mitchell Innes, at that time chargé d'affaires of the British Embassy at Washington.

Interstate Shipment of Intoxicating Liquors.

SPEECH

OF

HON. KENNETH D. McKELLAR,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 8, 1913,

On the bill (H. R. 17593) to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate-commerce character in certain cases.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the Webb bill for the following reasons:

In the first place, the bill is a fake, a false pretense, a makeshift, and, in my judgment, it is not intended as a real temperance measure, but it is only intended to give the temperance people something that is thought, by expert politicians, will appease them for the time being without hurting the liquor traffic. I predict that within six months after its passage no intelligent temperance man will claim that it is an effective temperance measure.

In the second place, the bill is either unconstitutional or void for indefiniteness. By the Constitution of the United States Congress was given exclusive authority and jurisdiction over certain specified subjects, and among these was the subject of interstate commerce. When Congress was given control of a subject of legislation, no provision appeared in that instrument by which Congress had the right to delegate such control or any part thereof back to the States. If such a provision existed Congress might give back all its powers to the States, and after the plan of this bill we would have no Constitution.

Now, this bill regulates or rather prohibits interstate shipments of liquor into dry territory, and Congress may have a right to do this if it exercised complete jurisdiction. This bill declines to fix a penalty for the violation of the act, but by inference leaves the punishment to the States, thus attempting to restore or delegate to the States a part of its jurisdiction over interstate shipments. This, in my judgment, Congress has no constitutional right to do. It can only pass a constitutional law on the subject by assuming entire jurisdiction and control of the subject.

This is easily seen from an examination of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution. If under the clause "to regulate commerce * * * among the several States" Congress can pass a law declaring certain kind of commerce illegal and leaving it to the State to punish infractions of the law, then, of course, under the power "to coin money" it could declare what kind of money should be coined and then leave it to the States to punish for violations of such a law. This would involve an absurdity. So, under the clause "to provide for the punishment for counterfeiting * * * coins of the United States," would anybody say that Congress would have the right to prohibit counterfeiting and leave it to the States to punish for the crime of counterfeiting, the very thing that Congress is given jurisdiction to do? And how would it do, under the constitutional authority "to establish post offices," for Congress to prohibit offenses against the post office and leave it to the States to punish for such offenses? Or how would it do, under the authority "to provide and maintain a navy," for Congress to pass a law prohibiting a State from having a warship and then leave it to the State to punish itself for having such a warship? The power regulating commerce is found in the same section with all the powers just set out.

It seems to me the mere asking of these questions in reference to these powers answers such questions.

If the bill had proceeded to fix punishment for the violation of the act and had brought into the bill the machinery of the Federal Government to prevent such violations, then it would not be subject to this constitutional objection. In its present form it is clearly unconstitutional, or, if it is not unconstitutional, then it is void for indefiniteness.

In the third place, it is not the measure that its temperance advocates think it is. They—and I am now speaking of the plain temperance people throughout our country—generally assume that under the provisions of this bill the United States Government is required to enforce and will enforce the Webb law and prohibit interstate shipments of liquor into dry territory; whereas there are no such provisions in the bill, and without such provisions the Federal Government has absolutely nothing to do with the enforcement of this law. The enforcement of the law is entirely left by inference to the State authorities; but at all events the Federal Government has no power under the act to enforce it.

In the fourth place, the bill, should it become law, will, in my judgment, but add another ineffective law—at all events, in so far as my State of Tennessee is concerned—to the already ineffective State-wide law which we now have there. If the State, county, or municipal authorities do not now enforce the State-wide law which we now have—and it is generally conceded in that State they do not enforce it—how can it be expected that these very authorities will enforce this law, which provides no penalty?

In the fifth place, in my judgment, there are but two effective ways of dealing with the liquor traffic. The first one is for the people of each county of each State to determine by their votes whether intoxicating liquors shall be manufactured, sold, or used in that county under what is known ordinarily as the local-option plan. If they vote to prohibit liquor, then the law can be enforced. Such a plan is not an absolutely effective plan, but it is better than prohibition without the consent of those to whom the law applies. The other plan is for Congress to put the liquor traffic on the same footing it has heretofore put lotteries or tax it out of existence throughout the country.

If it is constitutional to do it, or if not, then a constitutional amendment may be had, and Congress may decline to license liquor selling, liquor dealing, or liquor manufacturing everywhere within the United States, making it contraband, and so, by the machinery of the Federal Government, prevent its manufacture, sale, or use. The Federal Government is able to enforce effectively national prohibition against intoxicating liquors, while the several States can not enforce State-wide prohibition as long as the National Government legalizes its use, licenses its manufacture and sale, and collects taxes for dealing in it in dry territory as well as in wet territory. In other words, prohibition can not be made effective in the States as long as the National Government, expressly or impliedly, stands sponsor for it and collects the sum of hundreds of millions of dollars each year for its manufacture and sale.

In the sixth place, I am in favor of prohibition in the country districts and smaller towns where the temperance sentiment is strong enough to bring about the enforcement of the temperance laws. In the cities where a majority of the people are opposed to prohibition I am in favor of segregation of saloons, no screen doors, high license, strict regulation, no selling on Sunday nor between the hours of 11 at night and 6 in the morning, together with all proper forfeitures of license upon finding any reasonable regulation being violated, and all other proper regulations of the traffic, until at such time as it may be deemed wise for Congress, with a constitutional amendment or without it, to pass a law prohibiting the manufacture, sale, or use of intoxicating liquors, or taxing them out of existence. It is idle to talk about State wide prohibition being made effective by State laws or nonpenalty National laws as long as the National Government derives so great a revenue from its manufacture or sale, directly or indirectly, in dry territory. In other words, I am in favor of laws which will be practical, and which will bring about greater temperance rather than political prohibition laws, which bring about no effective results. I am in theory and practice a temperance man, and not a politico-prohibitio-potationist.

In the seventh place, Mr. Chairman, I believe in the enforcement of all laws. No greater injury can be done the people of a community than for them to have a law which is openly and notoriously violated by them. We have one such law on this subject now which is notoriously violated in Tennessee, and I am unable to give my consent to help enact another which, I believe, will be just as notoriously disregarded. It has been a matter of pride to us that our Federal laws are strictly enforced. I am unwilling by my vote to aid in passing a Federal law that does not on its face provide for its own enforcement. We have too much disrespect for our laws now.

I append as a part of my remarks an exact copy of the Webb bill as passed.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17593) to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate-commerce character in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That the shipment or transportation, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended, by any person interested therein, to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby prohibited.

SPEECH

OF

HON. FINIS J. GARRETT,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 8, 1913.

The House had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17593) to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate-commerce character in certain cases.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I take it that there has been no matter of legislation that has been proposed in this House during this session or many sessions past concerning which there is a better understanding of the situation than there is of this. For 20 years or more this has been a question of agitation. It is true, of course, that it is a sharply controverted question, but there has been, to my knowledge for the last eight years, during which time I have been a Member of this body, a persistent and growing demand that there should be consideration of this legislation in this House. That consideration has not yet been had. Whether rightly or wrongly I do not undertake to say, but it has been so repeatedly charged that a sentiment or belief has grown up throughout a large part of this country in the minds of thousands of people interested in this legislation that it has been deliberately suppressed and consideration of it prevented in the House.

I regret, so far as I am concerned, that the bill was not reported earlier from the Committee on the Judiciary. But, being reported at the time it was, I for one member of the Committee on Rules did not feel willing to stand in the way of the consideration of this legislation, for which there has been a long and growing demand in this country.

Why is it that gentlemen are not willing to march up and face this question? We must face it at some time. I know what effect it will have upon me. I know that the vote that I shall cast will alienate some friends from me. But, Mr. Speaker, as a public man acting upon my responsibility as a Representative, I must meet those conditions, and I stand ready to meet them. [Applause.]

The late Senator Frye, of Maine.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. CULLOP, OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 9, 1913,

On House resolution 823, paying tribute to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE, late a Senator from Maine.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, the man who by his individual efforts forges his way to the front in a great country like ours, who rises from the ranks to the position of leadership among men, struggling for the domination of power over the many who aspire to lead in the great conflicts ever going on, to mold and direct the policies of the Nation with its diversified thought and manifold interests, demonstrates his ability, individuality, and superior wisdom. Leadership is not created by selection alone, but is attained through rare individual genius as a quality of the individual's creation. Fortunate indeed is the man who has been blessed by this great quality, which he can employ in the prosecution of the work allotted him in the career he pursues throughout the journey of life.

In order for the individual to rise to the exalted position of leadership in a great Nation like ours, directing the formation and execution of policies, he necessarily must have been tested at the bar of public opinion and have displayed the rare qualities so essential for such an exalted position. To attain this position and hold it marks the individual as a person rarely endowed and demonstrates his superiority of mind and heart, as a genius capable of great accomplishments in the world. For a man to win his way by his own individual efforts from among the many who struggle around him for every advantage in every walk of life to high honors and great usefulness, to high position, demonstrates his ability, assures the value of his character, and the worth of his services. From 1831 to 1911 covered a wonderful period in the history of the world. No other 70 years in the calendar of time have been so important to the human race or bear witness of such great and wonderful strides in the advancement of every department of life.

WILLIAM P. FRYE, late a United States Senator for the State of Maine, lived throughout this period and was a witness to the great changes which went on during that long and important span of time. His career gave him opportunity to witness the marvelous growth and development which blessed and prospered a mighty and a deserving people. He had a remarkable public career, intrusted by a confiding constituency with public office almost continuously for 50 years, from 1861 to 1911, the last 42 years of which he served in the National Congress, 12 years in the House, and 30 in the Senate. In all this long service, as an evidence of the confidence reposed in him by the people of his State, he was designated by them, and not appointed by Executive authority, to the positions which he held. This fact is a mark of unusual distinction, belonging to but few of long public service. It is a record of which his family may well feel proud and cherish it as a legacy of inestimable value.

To have been the recipient of such honors from a constituency among which were to be found numerous persons of great ability and splendid qualifications well equipped for public duties in the same line of service, ambitious for preferment, establishes the great power of the man and his splendid leadership among men. His long tenure of service demonstrates his fidelity to the principles of the cause he espoused and the deference he gave to the wishes of the majority of his constituents who honored him with their support. He was a leader and carried conviction in the merit of every cause he advocated, winning public approval and party adhesion as the result of his efforts.

He arose step by step in public confidence until he became a power in the councils of a great Nation and was a potential factor in the policies it developed and executed for the Government of the millions who lived under its flag and proudly proclaimed their allegiance to the principles embodied in its system of government, who rejoiced in its triumphs, and stood ready to defend it against the assaults of hostile foes, who bore aloft its banner wherever the light of civilization guided the footsteps of the weary traveler, whether on land or sea.

In the great struggle for supremacy which surged around and about him for years he succeeded over all opposing forces by his resolute will power, keen and well-poised judgment, overcame all opposition directed at his overthrow, sustained his well-earned position, and successfully enforced the policies for which he so ably contended. He never capitulated or lowered his flag, but stubbornly resisted and overcame all opposition which might be pitted against him. He was truly a leader and a conspicuous figure among the great array of men who have been foremost in directing the affairs of a great Nation.

To have been honored for 42 consecutive years by a seat in the National Congress, the greatest lawmaking body in the world, is a distinction conferred upon but few men in the history of our Republic, however illustrious though many of its Members have been. This distinction of long and conspicuous service designates his rank among the great men who performed service during that period, establishes the esteem in which he was held and the confidence reposed in him by his constituency. It rears to his memory a tribute more enduring than any which could be erected out of marble or brass. It is a legacy bequeathed to his family to which generations will point with exultant pride as an honor of which but few in all the world can boast.

Through with the conflicts of life, crowned with high honors by his admiring friends, respected by his neighbors, and loved and mourned by his relatives and companions, he sleeps in the soil of his native city, surrounded by the people of his native State, who revere his memory and mourn his demise, waiting patiently for the great judgment day to enjoy the fruits of a well-spent life as a reward for his mission on earth.

Agricultural Appropriation Bill.

SPEECH
OF
HON. CHARLES G. EDWARDS,
OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 10, 1913,

On the bill (H. R. 28283) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I never like to miss an opportunity to say a few words in support of the Agricultural bill when it is up for consideration before the House.

Of all the money that is appropriated by Congress, none is appropriated for a better purpose than that which is carried in the agricultural bills to be used for the development of our agricultural resources.

As I have said before, "The farmer is the backbone of the country." This bill carries $17,593,275 to better conditions for our farmers.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The only criticism I have to make against the Agricultural Committee is that I do not believe enough money is appropriated for this important work. There is a disposition on the part of some, at times, to criticize appropriations without stopping to think of the importance of the work to be accomplished thereby. I favor economy as much as any gentleman on the floor of this House. There is an "economy," and there is a "false economy." That spirit to "economize" at the expense of the development of our agricultural resources and our commerce is the rankest kind of "false economy." Ours is indeed a great country. If it is to remain a great country we must keep step with the progress of the times if we are to maintain our high position among the other nations of the world. Those appropriations which go to internal improvements, such as aiding agriculture, increasing our commerce, building better roads, erecting public buildings, improving rivers and harbors, and doing other things out of which the people generally derive great benefit, is money well spent, out of which the Government and the people alike draw large dividends in the way of prosperity, comfort, and happiness.

WATERWAYS REDUCE FREIGHT RATES.

Some are narrow minded enough to claim that money spent in improving rivers and harbors is not well spent. Such talk is mere "demagoguery" and is intended to appeal to the prejudices of those who are not informed on the subject. Any man who will stop to think will at once recognize the fact that improving the waterways of our country opens up a healthy competition to the railways of the country. Everyone knows that freight can be handled by water much cheaper than by rail. That being true, it stands to reason, and is a fact, that the improvement of our waterways, putting them in competition with our railroads, greatly reduces freight rates, which inures directly to the benefit of the people. The work of encouraging agricultural development goes hand in hand with waterway improvement, as the two subjects are correlated in that the farmers feed and clothe the people of the world; and water transportation of their products, with other commerce, gives them cheaper freights, better facilities, and opens up the markets of all the world to our American farmers.

SOUTH SHOULD HAVE FOREIGN REPRESENTATIVES.

It is not my purpose to discuss the general subject of agricultural improvements, but only certain phases of it. Indeed, it would require too much time for me to undertake to discuss the subject as a general proposition.

Along with others coming from the cotton-producing section of the country, I wish to urge that the foreign representatives of this country to countries that are great users of cotton goods should come from that section of our country which produces the cotton. It stands to reason that we of the South know more about this subject than people of other sections where cotton is not grown. Occasionally, however, we find a gentleman here and there who has never seen a cotton stalk who thinks he knows more about the subject than those of us who plant and raise the staple.

Cotton is the great money crop of the United States and keeps our balance with other nations on the right side of the ledger. In times of depressions and panics our cotton is one article that is sent abroad in exchange for which foreign gold comes pouring into our Treasury. It is right that the Government should give the greatest possible consideration to those who are doing this great service. It is also right that we should have due consideration when the President of these United States comes to consider the appointment of gentlemen to represent us in the cotton-using countries of the world. The gentleman who claims to know all about cotton production and all about cotton, and who has never grown any of it nor seen any of it grown, is like the old maid who undertakes to tell the mother who has raised several children how children should be raised. I hope and believe, and the South hopes and believes, that when that illustrious son of the South, Gov. Woodrow Wilson, becomes President, he will see to it that our people are duly represented in the countries that use our cotton goods.

BUREAU OF MARKETS.

Another thing that I believe will be of inestimable benefit to the farmers of this country is a "bureau of markets" in the Department of Agriculture. With a bureau of markets, it is my opinion, our farmers will be enabled to sell all farm products to a better advantage. As it is now, our people depend largely upon boards of trade and chambers of commerce, broadly scattered and not acting in conjunction, without a common purpose, to handle the question of marketing and regulation of prices. Of course we must not lose sight of the fact that the question of supply and demand enters most largely into the fixing of all prices, if it is not interfered with by unscrupulous speculators. Through a bureau of markets, under national supervision, it is my opinion that much better results will come to the people and that farming will prove more profitable to those who engage in it, because new markets and better competition will be found for the products of our farms. Such a bureau can be established and operated without much additional cost.

AGRICULTURAL CREDITS.

It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that this country also needs a system of agricultural credits whereby the farmers may be protected against "money sharks" and against being "squeezed" into selling their products on low markets. Without going into detail at this time, I merely wish to register the suggestion that such a system would prove of lasting benefit to those who till the soil, and especially to the farmers who run small farms and work as tenants. It is well known that the farmers, generally speaking, are compelled to buy their fertilizers, live stock, and supplies on what is known in our section as fall time. They also make their loans from the banks in the same way. When the fall rolls around the merchant, the fertilizer dealer, the live-stock salesman, and the banker all want their money. The farmer wants to pay up, but perhaps the speculators have "beared" the market and prices are low. The farmer is in debt, and he is not able to hold his cotton, so he is compelled to sell. Now, if a system to extend credit upon agricultural lands and products, with governmental sanction and supervision, at a low rate of interest, can be worked out and adopted, the farmers would be able to hold their products and to sell on better and higher markets. A great saving would result to the farmers not only from being able to hold for better prices, but in interest charges as well.

BACK TO THE FARM.

One of the most serious questions that confronts this country to-day is how to keep the boys on the farms. It is an old and trite saying that a nation's prosperity is measured by its agriculture. The statement is true, and the sooner we can devise some way to prevent our people from abandoning their farms into "alien hands" the better it will be for us as a people and a Nation. This is no small or sectional matter. It calls for deep thought on the part of broad-minded men and statesmen, for it strikes at the very life of our national greatness and prosperity.

Go into almost any great southern city and you will find that a great per cent of the really successful men in it were reared on a farm. This fact, at first blush, affords satisfaction to those of us who were reared on farms, for we like to see our fellows climb up and reach the top of the hill. When we think it over seriously, however, and think of what successes might have been achieved by these same "country boys" had we remained on the farm, and when we think of the loss the country has sustained by these boys leaving the farm, and when we think of what this "farm leaving" will eventually lead to, we smother our pride in the matter with a patriotic love of our country and sound a note of warning that it must be stopped in some way or our country is doomed in its future greatness. Our great cities are absorbing too many country boys. The thought that the brains, energy, success, and power of the great cities in large measure are had at the expense of the farms is startling.

Here is one of the greatest opportunities for wise, effective, and real conservation that can well be imagined. Do not understand me to oppose the move of the country boy to the city if it really betters his condition and helps the country. This is a great economic question. Conditions must be created and our boys educated so that the farm will be attractive and so that our boys and girls will love the farm and find pleasure and profit in farm life. The reason many boys and girls leave the farms is because the surroundings and conditions do not appeal to them. If we can get the parents on the farm to work together, and if everybody will work together to the same end, to make farm life more attractive and profitable, our people will love the farms and will prosper and stick to them.

Here are a few facts showing how the farms are being drained of their best blood: Sixty-six per cent of those who till the soil in the United States do not own the land they work. In Georgia only 34 per cent of the farmers own the land which they till. The same thing in about the same proportion is true of many others of the Southern States. This condition is probably nation wide and presents a serious situation. It is becoming one of the greatest problems of the day and is due largely to the boys leaving the farm for the city. So serious has the matter been regarded in Mississippi that the State has found it expedient to pass a law regulating alien ownership of lands.

The problem must be faced and a remedy must be had. If this movement from the farm is not checked our greatness is doomed to decay.

EDUCATION AND BETTER CONDITIONS.

It is my opinion that a remedy against this serious and threatening situation can be found in the building up of a better system of rural and agricultural schools, good roads, rural telephones, better and more rural churches, rural free delivery, parcel post, a closer interest and sympathy among the farmers. "There should be a wider and more general dissemination of information on improved farming and better methods." Better and more comfortable homes, with modern conveniences, as far as possible, with beautiful gardens and trees, will all help to make the boys and girls like farm life. Much depends upon the farmer father. The boy must be treated right. He must be treated as a partner in the business instead of as a "farm hand." Teach him to know that farming is the oldest and most honorable of all the vocations known to man; give him part of the profits and let him feel that farming is a "business" and not merely a "means unto a living." Educate the boys and girls for what they are to follow. The Boys' Corn Club work has shown what can be done if the boys are encouraged and given a chance. Everybody must get behind the upward movement that will make for better conditions generally.

ABANDONED FARMS.

In many of the New England States miles of farms have been abandoned. Houses are vacant and, with other improvements, are falling into decay. This condition will extend throughout the country if wise and patriotic men do not take hold of the situation and work together and arrive at a solution of the question. What can we hope for as a people with our farms falling into "foreign hands" or going to certain disuse? It presents a question that is alarming and calls for serious consideration.

FARMING MUST BE ATTRACTIVE AND PROFITABLE.

If farming is made profitable farm life can be made attractive. If farming is profitable the boys and girls can be educated and conditions generally improved. The purpose of these agricultural appropriations is to help the farmer understand his soil and his business better and to aid him in arriving at methods that will prove profitable. The trouble is in many cases the farmer does not take advantage of the opportunities that are given him and does not accept the help that is offered him.

Another trouble, too, is that there are a great many "pin-headed" fellows who are full of envy and jealousy who are always criticizing. They never see any good in anything. They criticize what the National Government is doing and what the States are doing to help the farmers. A lot of them sneer at "book farming." The sooner the farmers recognize that farming is a business institution and that it requires business methods and education like other vocations require training and system the sooner will the farmer get his farms on a profitable basis.

FREE SEED.

Once in a while you will hear a "street-corner statesman," who is too lazy to "spit over his chin," criticizing Members of Congress for sending out free seed. It is an insult to that "brick-walk farmer" to send him seed, because the planting of them suggests work. I believe the real farmers appreciate the seed and are glad to get them. All progressive farmers are glad to get good and improved seed. There are those who are ever ready, however, to make light of the needs of the farmers, and there are some farmers who are fools enough to join in and make light of their own needs. It is easy to find fault, criticize, and tear down, but it is hard to build up and construct. We need construction and not destruction for our agricultural interests.

WILL HELP FARMERS.

I am glad to vote for this bill, and shall always be ready and willing to do all I can to aid in all that will really and materially result in benefit to the farmers, because I believe that through this important work many of these serious questions are going to be solved.

Contested-Election Case—McLean against Bowman.

SPEECH

OF

HON. J. HARRY COVINGTON,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, December 12, 1912.

The House had under consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Charles C. Bowman was not elected a Representative in the Sixty-second Congress from the eleventh district of Pennsylvania and is not entitled to a seat therein."

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of effort to put this election contest upon the narrowest partisan plane possible, and the speech of my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], would seem to imply that this side of the House is engaged in the business of encouraging improper election contests. I do not believe that any Democratic member of the Committee on Elections No. 1 needs, as a matter of fact, a defense, but, because there has been an effort here to demonstrate that this contest has been determined upon other circumstances than the testimony taken at the hearings, I desire to call attention to the fact that four of the most serious contests instituted against Republicans of this House were sent to that committee. One was the case of Wise against the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Crago, which was sent to the committee and by it was promptly dismissed. The case of Crowley against the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Wilson, who holds his seat by a narrow margin of 51 votes, with many close questions touching fraud, came to that committee, and upon a prompt and impartial examination of the testimony the sitting Member, Mr. Wilson, holds his seat. The distinguished gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. Hughes, had his seat contested by a Mr. Wiley, and there were grave charges made and proved, and there were many reasons why that contest might have been, with no show of partisanship, decided against the sitting Member, but, acting in accordance with the law and strict impartiality, the committee reported to dismiss that contest, and a militant Republican, the gentleman from West Virginia, rightfully continues to hold his seat. In the single case of McLean against Bowman, now under consideration, has the committee reported against the sitting Member.

In the short time I have I do not propose to go at length into the testimony which the committee found ample upon which to base a report that the sitting Member, Mr. Bowman, should not retain a seat in the House of Representatives by reason of corrupt practices affecting the voters in his district. No Republican member of the committee will try seriously to urge that Bowman's election was corruptly procured by his money with his consent.

I want, in the brief time I have, to demonstrate why on the merits of the case every vote should be cast to seat the contestant. I was not present in the House on Tuesday, but I will say that I subscribed to the report of the majority of the committee with regard to the insufficient notice of contest served by McLean upon Bowman. But that part of the report is now merely past history. The House, whether wittingly or unwittingly, has put itself in a parliamentary situation where it is squarely up to the proposition whether George R. McLean or the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Bowman, is entitled to a seat in this House on the merits of the testimony as found in the record. There was no objection made to the consideration on Tuesday of the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] that George R. McLean is entitled to a seat in this House. The question of consideration could easily have been raised, but, on the contrary, unanimous consent was given for a vote upon it. Therefore a Member casting his vote to-day must cast it, if at all, on the final proposition, purely and simply on the merits of the case as disclosed in the testimony. He will by his vote say either that McLean was elected or that he was not elected.

Now, I want briefly to go over the testimony because that is the only fair way to have Members pass upon the case.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I have only a few moments, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say that unanimous consent was given, otherwise the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania could not have been presented on the floor. If the gentleman made such a statement as that, he is in entire error.

Mr. COVINGTON. What I am stating is that there is before the House at this time, whether from one parliamentary cause or another, a resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] which requires the House expressly to pass on the question whether or not McLean was in reality elected. The question of the consideration of that resolution could easily have been raised, but by unanimous consent it is before us.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in an examination of the testimony I find that a point is made against Mr. McLean in the total amount expended for watchers. In that connection I desire to say this, that I attach no importance to the name by which these men are denominated. It makes no difference whether you call them poll men, watchers, or special watchers. The crux of this case is the fact, heretofore not referred to, that Jonathan R. Davis, the campaign manager of the sitting Member, Mr. Bowman, swore in his testimony that as the chairman of the Republican county committee of Luzerne County, handling the party funds for the entire party in that county, he had employed watchers to the number required by law for the voting precincts in that county, in addition to the men who were paid for as special watchers with Mr. Bowman's money. Therefore he had done all he legally could under the Pennsylvania statute when, representing the Republican Party as a whole, he had employed the legal number of poll men or watchers or special watchers in every precinct in the county. Every one of the men paid for by him were, therefore, the men secured under the suspicious circumstances he admitted when he stated that it was sometimes to get Democrats to vote the Republican ticket. Corroborated as it is by Walter Richards (p. 432 of the record), who said that when his money was given to him by Mr. Davis himself, it was given to him "to go out and 'get' Democrats with" in that precinct. It is an irresistible inference that the money for "special watchers" for Bowman was money used to corrupt the electorate.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield, if the gentleman will pardon me, because I have a few moments.

When you take the election expense account of Mr. McLean, what a different story. In the aggregate, whether for special watchers, poll men, general watchers, or other workers, as the case may be, incident to the regular election-day work, there is a total of $3,310. Of this money, the testimony shows that $450 was expended for purposes allowed by law incident to registration or was returned to Mr. McLean unused after the election.

That left as the sum total of expenditure for poll men or watchers, or special watches, $2,860, which upon the basis of $5 per man, which was the admitted price that both parties had to pay for legal workers, a sum of money that was not sufficient to get two watchers or two poll men or special watchers, by whatever name you denominate them, at each precinct in Luzerne County; and I find as the significant commentary upon the contestant's case that the only charge made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY], in an able speech in commenting upon alleged improper practices of the contestant, is that his conduct of the election in the employment of the special watchers, as he calls them, was illegal. He does assert that contestant's brother was employed as the campaign treasurer, but I find that there is no provision in the law of Pennsylvania that prevents a candidate for Congress, where the territorial extent of his district may be different from the extent of the territory in which State senators and legislative candidates shall run, from having a political chairman and treasurer of his own. Consequently, when Mr. McLean designated his brother as the treasurer of his campaign he was, as gentlemen on the other side from Pennsylvania know, well within his legal rights.

Let us look at another phase of the testimony as showing that the contestant should be seated. I take it there is no man in this House who can fail to believe that the practices recited in the record as carried on by Mr. Bowman's manager, Mr. Davis, with the acquiescence of Mr. Bowman and with money provided by him, constitutes such a state of facts as demonstrate beyond doubt the guilty knowledge and guilty participation of that gentleman in the frauds in Luzerne County at his election.

But I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that in seating a contestant in this House we should be guided by the evidence. In addition to the fact that Mr. Bowman is not entitled to his seat because of fraudulent practices, there must be demonstrated facts that will show that the contestant is entitled to the seat by virtue of having received a majority of the legally cast votes in the election.

Mr. Bowman, the sitting Member, received, all told, 14,384 votes. George R. McLean, the contestant, received 13,834 votes, a majority for Mr. Bowman of 550 votes. In that majority were 722 votes cast for him upon the Prohibition ticket. It is a queer circumstance that M. F. Larkin, with an honorable record of a lifetime of prohibition activities in Pennsylvania, received in the same district 242 votes, while the remarkable apostle of prohibition, the sitting Member, Bowman, who had been advertised as a friend of the liquor dealers and for whom reference had been given to John Kehoe, liquor dealer of Nanticoke, received 722 Prohibition votes, or 500 more votes than Larkin, that fine exponent of real Pennsylvania prohibition sentiment.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I can not yield.

Mr. BOWMAN. There is nothing in the testimony to support that statement—not a word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is out of order.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman knows I can not get into a controversy in the time I have. The record speaks for itself, and the testimony and figures are there. His mere denial can not vary the truth.

But in order that there shall be no question in the mind of a single man when he casts his vote, I have not excluded a single one of the 722 tainted Prohibition votes which he supposedly received.

Mr. Speaker, in Foster Township, northwest, Bowman received 105 votes and McLean received 10 votes and Quinn, Socialist, received 3 votes. There were 118 votes counted for the candidate for Congress in that district. The testimony shows that it was a district inhabited almost entirely by miners who are foreign born and can not speak the English language; that few of them could read a line upon the Pennsylvania ballot, which, by reason of a State election, was very large. There were only 117 men whose names appear upon the registration list in the precinct as casting ballots that day, and, notwithstanding the certainty there were many spoiled ballots, there were more votes counted for the candidates for Congress than the total number of persons voting in the precinct. That certainly is conclusive evidence that the election in the precinct was fraudulent. It is impossible under the law and under the decisions of this House to purge a poll of that character, and I have excluded that precinct in arriving at my computation. I have deducted that vote from the vote received for both Bowman and McLean.

In Hazel Township, twelfth district, Latimer, Bowman received 128 votes; McLean received 25 votes. It is recorded in the testimony that between 35 and 40 of those votes were marked inside the polling room by Nicholas Cictola, a mine boss, who could not read the English language but only knew how to make a mark on the ballot in the Republican column that had been shown to him. The marking of those ballots by Cictola was, moreover, a flagrant violation of the Pennsylvania law.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. COVINGTON. I can not yield to the gentleman at this time.

Mr. FARR. I would simply like to correct a mistaken impression of the gentleman.

Mr. COVINGTON. In addition to that it was testified that Wesley Hall, a mine foreman in that district, stated on the night before the election in the saloon frequented by the voters of the foreign-born horde that "we control you Italians; we give you jobs; who don't vote the way we say won't be here long." If the Members of this House do not treat that conduct as gross intimidation, I submit that the question of intimidation at the polls becomes a dead letter. I have excluded in the computation Hazel Township, twelfth district, Latimer, upon the ground of the improper marking of ballots by Cictola and the overwhelming intimidation of the mine foreman.

It is the same story in Hazel Township, third district, Milnesville, where they did not permit the Democratic Party to have a representative in the polling room. The returns gave Bowman 95 votes and McLean only 51, although the evidence is that is a Democratic precinct.

It is the undisputed testimony that the Republican watchers went inside the rail with voters and marked their tickets in violation of the law. One voter was actually found who had gotten his money for voting for Bowman, and I have excluded that township in the computation.

It was a similar condition in Nanticoke, ninth ward, where Bowman received 109 votes and McLean 66. In this precinct John Karboski spent $90 for 15 voters for supposed "watching," although the legal watchers were there and paid separately by Davis. With 3 Republican paid election officers and 2 watchers, the paying of 15 men out of the remaining 104 Republican votes is nothing less than wholesale bribery. This is a mining precinct, and the clerk of the chief of mines of Pennsylvania was at the polls taking voters inside and marking their tickets. For the bribery and intimidation I have excluded this precinct in the computation.

In Nanticoke, eleventh ward, John Karbosky employed 11 men out of a total of 109 votes and paid them, although there were 5 paid employees in the polling room and 3 paid watchers. The constable, a Republican officer, stood around the polls at this precinct and inspected the tickets as the voters went in and would not permit a proper record of votes to be made unless he was satisfied. Gross intimidation by an officer of the law and expenditure of money illegally with voters in that precinct and with no method of determining the corrupt ballots leave as the only test that can be applied that of excluding the poll and let both the votes for Bowman and those for McLean go out, so I have rejected that precinct in the computation.

In Duryea Borough, second ward, there were 10 so-called watchers paid, exclusive of the regular watchers. Call them what you please, 10 were employed and paid especially for Bowman in this one small precinct where the vote was returned Bowman 112 and McLean 30.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. COVINGTON. I can not yield. The gentleman will understand that I have a very short time to present this case. I can not yield now, I will say, to anyone.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I can not yield to anyone, because of the limited time I have.

In Duryea Borough, second ward, I have said, there were these 10 corruptly paid watchers. It was in the testimony that when the ballot box was brought there, in violation of the law, it contained packages that appeared like ballots already put in the box; that when the one lone Democrat, Michael Cleary, who had summoned up the courage to go there as a Democratic watcher—and who said he did not want to be like the men who were driven like dogs or like sheep to the shambles and who went to vote against their will—asked what the ballots were doing in the box. Instead of being given an opportunity to look at them, the judge of the election said his brother and another Republican worker had the key to the ballot box and that they would take it outside to unlock it.

When they brought it back he complained the second time because the box still had some of those ballots in it. When Dr. Baker, a Democratic voter, came to cast his ballot, the hour having arrived, he made complaint that there was something in the ballot box, because when it was moved on the table he could hear the shuffle or rattle. Cleary then testified that later in the day, about half an hour only, when there was a chance to examine the unused ballot sheets, which are printed in books and are detached as checks are detached, a hundred of those ballots were missing. In that same precinct there lived the skillful Lawrence Cosgrove, who was given $150 by Jonathan R. Davis, the campaign manager of Bowman, in order, as Bowman says, that stories might be cleared away that were circulated about him, when, as a matter of fact, he, Bowman, testified on his own oath that he knew not what the stories were, and that his character was such that he did not need to have any stories about him refuted. Cosgrove was chief of police, a nominal Democrat, and could use money effectively with the rough element. In this precinct the mine bosses took large numbers of men into the booths and at times entirely surrounded the ballot box. For corruption, intimidation, and stuffing the ballot box I have rejected this poll in the computation.

In the second ward of Edwardsville the returns as canvassed at night gave Bowman 14 and McLean 48. This was the public announcement of the election officials in the poll room, made as required by law—the notice posted on the door of the polling place. The same return was given to the morning paper in Wilkes-Barre. The official sheet at the canvass showed figures of Bowman 49 and McLean 42. Election officials testified that the first figures were correct, and I have taken them in my computation.

In Nanticoke Borough, fifth ward, 8 men were admitted to have been paid for so-called "watchers." The sum of $150 was spent there, and with the small vote of Bowman 130 and McLean 40 there is no other explanation than that general bribery was practiced, so I have rejected the entire poll in the competition.

In Foster Township, Hazlebrook district, the vote returned was Bowman 71, McLean 2, although the voters' list contained but 74 names, and many of the voters were ignorant foreign-born miners who could not mark a ticket correctly. John Evans, the mine foreman, spent $110 of Bowman's money in this precinct. Stevens, a miner who was a Republican judge, admitted that no one went in with a voter unless he got consent from him. The Republican watcher was permitted to designate who should go in with voters who asked for help in marking tickets. It also appeared that Evans, who worked for Bowman, was the general superintendent of the mine employing all the voters in the precinct, and that these men lived in houses leased from his company and bought their food and clothes from the company store. The proof of bribery and intimidation at this precinct seemed conclusive, and I have eliminated its returns in my computation.

Mr. Speaker, without attempting to analyze the conditions and deduct the vote in any other precincts where the total absence of anything approaching an honest poll is so obvious as to warrant rejection, I call the attention of the House to the fact that the precincts which I have dealt with and rejected in my computation, together with the second ward of Edwardsville, where I have taken the original and unquestionably correct and honest returns, cause the vote of the contestee, the sitting Member, to be reduced 894 votes, while the vote of the contestant, McLean, is reduced 274.

This makes a net reduction in the Bowman plurality of 620, and as he only had 550 on the canvassed returns, it gives McLean a plurality of 70 votes. As a matter of fact, if time permitted, other precincts could be shown where the fraud and corruption should cause their rejection and still further increase McLean's plurality.

Mr. Speaker, the truth is this election reeked with fraud on the part of the contestee, Representative Bowman. The majority report shows that $555 was distributed by Davis from the "special watchers" fund for use in Plymouth Township, six districts. The contestee's brief, at page 77, admits that only 403 votes were cast in the township. Eliminating the 30 men employed in the polling places and the 18 regular watchers, there were 355 voters left, for which $555 was used to pay the supposed workers. That such conduct was fraud and corruption by Bowman can not be denied. I have pointed out that this case is before the House on its merits. A resolution to seat McLean must be met by a vote irrespective of the issue of his delay in filing his contest. The figures have been given which show his election. A new conscience has arisen in the political life of the American people, which demands that corruption shall be driven from public life. In this election contest not only should Bowman, the corrupt gentleman from Pennsylvania, be driven from his seat, but the proper recognition of the actual election of his opponent should be evidenced by the seating of the contestant, McLean. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Rockefeller Foundation.

SPEECH

OF

HON. H. ROBERT FOWLER,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 6, 1913.

The House had under consideration the bill (H. R. 21532) to incorporate the Rockefeller Foundation.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, by the terms of this bill it is proposed to grant a special charter to incorporate what is known as the "Rockefeller Foundation," with the ostensible object, as stated by the terms of the bill in section 3, "to promote the well-being and to advance the civilization of the people of the United States and its Territories and possessions and of foreign lands in the acquisition and dissemination of knowledge; in the prevention and relief of suffering; and in the promotion, by eleemosynary and philanthropic means, of any and all of the elements of human progress." By the terms of section 4 this corporation is given unlimited power "to purchase, hold, or sell real estate," which is against the settled policy of this country. Corporations are usually accorded the right to purchase and hold real estate sufficient to carry on the business of the corporation, as, in the case of a banking corporation, it is permitted to purchase and own in fee simple the building in which its business is transacted. By the terms of section 5 it is given unlimited power "to take or receive, whether by gift, grant, devise, bequest, or purchase, any real or personal estate, and to hold, convey, transfer, hire, or lease the same," which is also against our American policy. As a rule corporations are not permitted to buy and sell real estate for profit. The power of Congress to issue charters for the incorporation of companies is limited to cases where the company is the agent of the country in carrying out constitutional functions of government, as in case of national banks. Such charters are upheld by our courts on the theory that Congress has conferred upon these banks governmental functions. Again, Congress issues charters to companies to build bridges over navigable streams under its constitutional power over and the control of the navigable waters of the country, and upon the theory that the construction of such bridges is in the interest of navigation. By the terms of section 11 all of the property of this corporation, both real and personal, its holdings being limited to $100,000,000, is exempt from taxation, which I do not think is right. I am in favor of big wealth bearing its just share of the burdens of taxation. No other rule is fair to the poor.

Mr. Speaker, who ever heard of such unlimited power conferred upon a corporation before? Will not the passage of this bill establish a dangerous precedent which will be hard to overcome in the future, and should we not carefully count the cost before placing upon the statute books a law of such magnitude and import? Who can say that corporations will not use it as a club to hammer future Congresses into the passage of charters incorporating companies for private gain?

What is the real purpose of this bill? Is it for the "civilization" of mankind the world over, as is claimed by the friends of the bill, or is there a "nigger in the woodpile"? If for civilizing purposes, why wait for the passage of this bill before beginning such important business? Congress may refuse to pass it; if so, will Mr. Rockefeller give up his civilization business? Well, then, the "nigger in the woodpile" is revealed, for there is nothing to prevent him from incorporating his company under the laws of the District of Columbia or the laws of most any State of the Union. He might have done this a long time ago and civilized many people by this time, both at home and abroad. Let us wait; we shall see. Time proves all things; but, tell me, you friends of the bill, what is the real object of this legislation? Is it not really a means of getting the stamp of approval by Congress of the methods which Mr. Rockefeller has pursued in the accumulation of his vast fortune? This I believe to be the real purpose of the bill. If so, then no decent man can afford to vote for it. But some say we ought to pass it for the reason that we will get back a million dollars. No one would advise the release of a common culprit on condition that he restore a portion of the stolen goods, but all would insist that he surrender all such goods to the owner and then in addition that he be punished as provided by the criminal code. It is said that Mr. Rockefeller is worth a billion dollars, which represents the daily earnings of many laboring people. The methods by which this vast fortune has been accumulated is regarded by public opinion as being tainted, and I will not vote to place the name of the owner thereof on the roll of honor. "Thou shalt not steal" is a heavenly injunction which should be respected by all.

Mr. Speaker, Congress is now very busily engaged, through its Committee on Banking and Currency, in the investigation of the big money institutions to see whether there is a money trust in this country. A subpœna has been placed in the hands of the Sergeant at Arms of the House to serve upon the brother of the man who is urging the passage of this bill, and much money has been expended to locate him in order that he may be brought before this investigating committee to testify, but so far he has been in such secret hidings that even the secret service men have been unable to locate him. Is it possible that Congress will pass this bill, eulogizing John D. Rockefeller and indorsing his commercial methods of accumulating money while at the same time his brother William defies the right of Congress to make such investigation and secretly sails to a foreign shore for the purpose of getting beyond the jurisdiction of the officers of this House? It seems impossible that such should be done by real statesmen, and yet I know that some people are often charmed to madness by the glitter of gold. Thirty pieces of silver was the price of the betrayal. Who would betray the honor of this country for any sum of tainted money, however great?

It is said that a rich Indian can never be truly great among his people until he has given away his wealth and become poor. The method by which this is done is called the "potlatch." A day is set apart for the distribution; all members of his tribe are invited to be present; and his entire wealth is given away by him to his people, and he becomes poor but great. Our white financial chief has been giving away some of his stuff, but now he wants us to dignify his potlatch by an act of Congress before he starts out with a hundred million dollars to civilize mankind.

George F. Baker, chairman of the First National Bank, testified before the Pujo money-investigating committee a short time ago, and admitted that his bank in 50 years had made $86,000,000 profits on a capital of $500,000. Judge Gary, president of the United States Steel Corporation, testified before the Ways and Means Committee in 1909, and admitted that his corporation was worth nearly $1,500,000,000. His company was established in 1858, with a capital of $1,800, and within 50 years a profit of more than $1,000,000,000 has been made on a capital of $1,800. The evidence before the Stanley investigating committee of the Steel Corporation revealed that 21 directors of this concern held the majority of the stock and the control on the directorate of insurance, banking, industrial, and franchise corporations of this country aggregating more than $30,000,000,000, which is about one-fourth of all of the wealth in America. Such enormous accumulations have come about by special privileges to rob labor.

Section 1 of this bill provides for the directors of this corporation and mentions their names, which are as follows: John D. Rockefeller, John D. Rockefeller, jr., Frederick T. Gates, Starr J. Murphy, Harry Pratt Judson, Simon Flexner, Edwin A. Alderman, Wickliff Rose, and Charles O. Heydt, nine in all. But it will be seen that none of them represent labor, the source of all the money proposed to be devoted to the cause set forth in the bill. It is said that royalty admires the beautiful colors produced by the skill of the dyer, but that it despises the dyer himself because he is a laborer. Had Mr. Rockefeller been grateful to labor for his smooth, round millions, he could have revealed it in no more striking terms than by placing on the directorate of this proposed corporation the names of intelligent laboring men, who abound in great numbers throughout the country and who are real civilizers of men. Not only would he have recognized labor, but he would have inspired confidence in the mind of the public as to his sincerity of purpose, and would have added much to the usefulness of his enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, it is said that a few years ago in a small town in Pennsylvania there lived a little girl by the name of Grace Conkling who was a great lover of Sunday school. She was brilliant by nature, and her love for and devotion to the study of the Bible made her a favorite. She was stricken down with fever, and when she realized that she could not recover she called for her mother and made her will, devising all of her possessions to the Sunday school. On the next Sunday after her death her little bank was brought in the Sunday school and opened and found to contain 77 pennies, which was her entire wealth, but all devised to the cause of Christ. She was only 7 years old, yet she presented a gift to God which has never been equaled before save once, and that was the gift of the widow's mite. It was so inspiring to the people and patrons of that Sunday school that they made it the nucleus of a fund which soon grew in size sufficient to build a handsome church house.

Mr. Speaker, let us build churches and erect institutions of learning to aid us in our struggle for a higher and better civilization, but not with tainted money. Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed because of the wickedness of their inhabitants. The tower of Babel fell because of the unholy purpose for which it was erected. The playhouses of Rome and Greece's temples of paganism lie in piles of monumental ruins to remind us of the unholy purposes for which they were used. The kiss of Judas Iscariot was but the sign of the betrayal. Let us not be deceived. We can not elevate ourselves physically by tugging at our own bootstraps; neither can we expect to improve our civilization by corrupting our own morals. A nation's greatness is measured by the intelligence and morals of her individual citizens. Then let us defeat this bill and say to the malefactors of wealth that we have no place in our civilization for their wealth until it is purged by a confession of guilt and returned to its rightful owners.

The Late Representative Malby, of New York.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, January 26, 1913.

The House had under consideration House resolution 795, paying tribute to the memory of Hon. GEORGE R. MALBY, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, to-day we meet to pay a tribute to the memory of a great man. He was great in the estimation of those who knew his capacity, his ability, his real worth. He was not a spectacular man; he was modest. He did not indulge in the modern method of advertising those qualifications that fitted him so preeminently for the public service.

He came to this House not as a novice, but as a man well endowed and well equipped for the public service. Entering public life in the State of New York the year I left school, he served in the two houses of the legislature during a period when really great men participated in the public affairs. Very early in his career he became the leader of his party in the lower house of the State legislature, later served as speaker, and subsequently entered the State senate. In both of those bodies he quickly took a commanding position. During the last four years of his service in the Senate of New York he was chairman of the finance committee, a position of power and of influence, and one requiring comprehensive knowledge and sound discretion. Those who are familiar with the history of the State of New York during the period in which Mr. MALBY served the State in the legislature will recall the names of some of the giants in intellect, in ability, and commanding force with whom he served, such men as Ellsworth, Stranahan, Brackett, White, Raines, Grady, Coggeshal, McCarren. All of them rank high in the opinion of those who appreciate great natural force, added to learning, industry, extraordinary capacity, and dominant will power to enact legislation according to their convictions. When Mr. MALBY entered the House of Representatives, he came here after a service to the State that well fitted and equipped him for the arduous duties incident to service in this body.

I had not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with him prior to his entrance into this body. I had frequently seen him in public life, and I was thoroughly familiar with his great work, but I had never met him. Early in his service in the House he was assigned to the committee of which I am now the chairman—the Committee on Appropriations. I soon marveled at the very wide information which he had accumulated upon almost every question affecting the public service. I quickly learned to respect his sound and cautious judgment and his warm-hearted and liberal nature. The late James G. Blaine, in his matchless eulogy on the late President Garfield, more accurately than anyone else pictured the manner in which men are estimated in this House. In that beautiful oration he said:

There is no test of a man's ability in any department of public life more severe than service in the House of Representatives; there is no place where so little deference is paid to reputation previously acquired or to eminence won outside; no place where so little consideration is shown for the feelings or the failures of beginners. What a man gains in the House he gains by sheer force of his own character, and if he loses and falls back he must expect no mercy and will receive no sympathy. It is a field in which the survival of the strongest is the recognized rule, and where no pretense can deceive and no glamour can mislead. The real man is discovered, his worth is impartially weighed, his rank is irreversibly decreed.

With this picture in mind, with an intimate knowledge of his attainments, his ability, his ripe judgment, and his industry, I know, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. MALBY had attained a high and an influential and a commanding position in this House.

He was a man strong in his convictions. While I differed with him upon political questions, I respected the sincerity with which he expressed his views and the earnest manner in which he advocated them. He was a strong man. He was not timid, neither was he offensive in his advocacy, but when convinced that his views were right, no fear of public clamor, no desire to avoid the difficulties that arose from standing in opposition to what seemed to be overwhelming public sentiment could sway him from his purpose. I recall distinctly that within a very brief time this House had under consideration a resolution designed to terminate the treaty with Russia. He was opposed to the resolution. I recall the calm, dispassionate manner in which he expressed his belief that the resolution was unwise, unjustifiable, and unnecessary. Holding such convictions, regardless of the overwhelming sentiment of the country and the Congress, he alone recorded himself in opposition to the resolution. Those who have served here know that it is not easy for men in public life to stand alone in opposition to measures which seem to have behind them the overwhelming sentiment of the country, and yet no characteristic is more essential and important in public men than that determination to register their views and to act in accordance with their convictions upon fundamental questions regardless of the opinions of others or of the effect upon themselves personally.

In the work of the committee of which Mr. MALBY was a member, and upon which I served with him, his services were invaluable. It is a committee, Mr. Speaker, wherein the services of men are not so showily done as to attract the attention of the public. It is a work of monotony and drudgery, and yet he brought to that work his great equipment, his wide information, his painstaking efforts, and his sound judgment, all of which made him invaluable. In his death this House lost a distinguished, a valuable, and an important Member; the country a useful public servant; his friends one whose open and warm heart was ever ready to respond to every application made for help; and his family a most loving, a most kind, a most thoughtful and considerate husband and parent. His memory will linger long enshrined in the hearts of those who knew and loved him best.

The Filipinos Unanimous in Favor of Independence.

SPEECH

OF

HON. MANUEL L. QUEZON,

OF PHILIPPINE ISLANDS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 28, 1913.

The House in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill H. R. 28186, the fortification appropriation bill.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to answer the remarks both of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. The gentleman from Kentucky seems to be so much concerned about the welfare of the Filipino people that I wish to give him publicly my thanks for his good will and altruism toward my people. His speech, however, reminds me of similar speeches made in the House of Commons, of England, more than 130 years ago, when members of that House opposed the independence of the Thirteen Colonies on the ground that it was to the benefit of the colonists to remain under the control of Great Britain. History undoubtedly repeats itself, and we see repeated to-day what has taken place in centuries gone by. To-day it is alleged on the floor of this House and to the American people that it is to the interest of the Filipinos to be under American control. So it has been said a hundred thousand times in different countries by those who wanted to rule a foreign people against the avowed will of the governed. I think it was Lincoln who said: "You will find that all the arguments of kingcraft were always of this class; they always bestrode the necks of the people, not that they wanted to do it but because the people were better for being ridden. Turn it every way you will, whether it came from the mouth of a king as an excuse for enslaving the people of his country, or from the mouth of men of one race for enslaving the men of another race, it is all the same old serpent."

Mr. Chairman, the time allotted to me is too short for an intelligent discussion of the great proposition that no people has a right to impose its government upon another. I doubt very much whether there be a single American who would sustain the opposite theory. He who dares do that would be challenging the whole political history of his own country. The gentleman from Kentucky himself said that "the idea"—the subjection of a foreign people—"in its abstract statement is abhorrent to my"—his—"nature." But, apparently the gentleman has found some way to avoid quarreling with his conscience, when he stands for the continuation of American rule in the islands.

Laying this phase of the question aside, I wish to challenge the assertion both of the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from California that only the people in and around Manila are crying for independence or know anything about it.

It is bad taste to speak of one's self, but I can adduce no better testimony against that assertion than my own. I do not come from Manila, nor from near Manila. My native town, Baler, is far up on the northeastern coast of Luzon. It is a small town of no more than 2,000 inhabitants, without communication with Manila some months of the year. I was born and went to public school there before anybody ever thought that the United States would be in control of the Philippines. I have never been a resident of Manila, except temporarily. Yet I have fought for Philippine independence with an ineffectual gun—when I was but a college boy, and knew that there was no hope for my people to win in that unequal war against the powerful Army of the United States. I have exposed my life in many a battle, suffered hunger and fatigue for the cause of my country's freedom. After the war was over I advocated in peace for this very cause, and now I am here pleading for the same. Like me, millions of Filipinos, who are not from Manila, want independence, and millions of these have not even seen Manila at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from the Philippines has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield the gentleman five minutes more. I want him to have plenty of time.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, if I may, I would like to ask, How many Filipinos has the gentleman from Kentucky met? How many Filipinos has the gentleman from California met?

The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] said that the Christian governor of a Province just on the border of the territory inhabited by the Igorotes made the remarkable statement that in his judgment the best thing to do with these wild Igorotes is to kill them all. Of course, the gentleman could not have heard that statement, for he never was in the Philippines, and I imagine his is second-hand information. How reliable was the source of information of the gentleman from California I do not know, for he has not given the House the circumstances attending his acquisition of this notion. But let us suppose, for the sake of the argument only, that there was such inhuman Filipino governor, which I doubt very much, for I know them all, and they are all men of high character; let us suppose, I repeat, that such a case as the gentleman referred to existed; is the gentleman right in concluding from that that the Filipino people are unfit for self-government? When the gentleman was speaking I reminded him of the fact that at one time somebody in this country said that the only good Indian was the dead Indian. I may also cite the instance of a governor of one State who pardoned the murderer of his political enemy. This act does not speak highly of the executive who did it, but no one would think of accusing the people of that State, much less of the whole United States, of lack of competency for self-government.

There is no country upon the face of the earth free from public officials whose proper place is either an insane asylum or a double-guarded jail. But if this fact proves anything, it is only that men are not as yet perfect.

We, the Filipinos, make no claim to be any better, but neither do we admit we are any worse, than other inhabitants of the globe. It would be a phenomenon if every Filipino official were a model of wisdom, virtue, energy, and patriotism. For ordinary human beings, our men in public life have made a remarkably good showing.

Whenever the question of Philippine independence is discussed upon the floor of this House, or anywhere else, gentlemen never fail to speak of the good work done by the United States in the Philippines. The criticisms made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] upon the Governor General and the Philippine Commission have provoked a storm of protest. It has never been my policy to indulge in attacks on the Philippine Government or its officials; in the first place, because the right of my people to independence stands not on the ground of your success or failure in the islands, but on something wholly alien to your doings or undoings there. It stands upon that eternal truth, as eternal as God, that every people has the right to establish a government of its own, and such government as to it shall seem best; in the second place, because I always feared, and, after what I have seen this morning, I am convinced, that a policy of criticism would alienate from my cause some people that might otherwise be with me. I shall not, therefore, take sides in this contention; thirdly, because people under foreign rule are more concerned about having their own government than good government. Self-government first, good government afterwards.

I can not afford to antagonize any man on this floor, and I am not going to do it if I can help it. I am, or rather the cause I represent is, absolutely at your mercy. You may vote to free the Philippines or to retain them forever, just as you will. You do not owe us anything and you are not, in the strict sense of the word, obliged to do anything for us. I need the sympathy, the good will of everyone of you for the aspirations of 8,000,000 people. I want your votes, every one of them, and God forbid that I shall ever do or attempt to do anything which will make me lose one vote that I could have obtained. I should never forgive myself. But let me say this: Why should anyone be surprised if he is told that Government officials in the Philippine Islands make mistakes? Why should anyone feel offended if he is told that Government officials in the Philippine Islands do wrong? Do not your own officials in the United States make mistakes? Do not they do wrong? Mind you, the officials here are administering the affairs of a people whom they know well, because it is their own people, whom they must serve to the best of their ability, since otherwise they will be put out of office. On the other hand, the wisest American in the Philippines is not so well acquainted with the people and their needs, and he does not owe his position to the Filipinos. Upon what theory is that official to do better than his comrades at home are doing? Do you believe that by virtue of some unknown magic the American who goes to the Philippines is exalted above all human weakness?

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me tell you what occurs to me whenever a gentleman speaks of the achievements of the Government along educational, commercial, industrial, and political lines in the Philippines. It seems to me that these achievements are the best proof of the ability of the Filipino people to govern themselves. Every improvement in the Philippines has been made because we gave the money, the brains, and the labor that did it. That, as compared with the conduct of other nations in their colonies, you have done well in the Philippines is something outside the discussion. That you are to be given credit for not having established a purely military rule in the islands when you had the power to do it, is also admitted. But that you could have done better than you did is, without question, true. Listen to these words of ex-President Roosevelt:

> Save only our attitude toward Cuba, I question whether there is a brighter page in the annals of international dealing between the strong and the weak than the page which tells us of our doings in the Philippines.

Note these words, "Save only our attitude toward Cuba," which means that you have treated Cuba better than you have the Philippines. And it is so. What did you do for Cuba which you did not do for the Philippines? You gave independence to Cuba while you denied it to the Philippines. Your history in the Philippines would have been most glorious and magnanimous if you had only recognized the republic of the Philippines, which we, at the greatest sacrifice, had established.

It is this, therefore, that made your "doings" in Cuba read more brilliantly than your doings in the Philippines. What could have prompted you to do one thing in one country and another in another? Why should you not have done as much for the Filipinos as for the Cubans? Admiral Dewey said that, knowing the Cubans and the Filipinos alike, he considered the Filipinos better fitted for self-government than the Cubans. But, even without this assurance, it must certainly be admitted that there is no reason for distinction which discriminates against the Philippines.

Mr. Chairman, let every Member of this House understand that Filipinos from every part of the archipelago are longing to see their country free. It is not true that only those from Manila are in favor of Philippine independence. The Philippine Assembly, composed of members coming from the different islands, has been petitioning Congress year after year to recognize the independence of the Philippines. There are in the assembly only two members from Manila and very few from the surrounding districts.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. How many come from Moro and Mindanao?

Mr. QUEZON. None from the Moro Province, because the Congress has deprived the Moros of the right to elect delegates, but there are a few from Mindanao.

Mr. SHERLEY. How much intercourse has there been between the Moros and the Christian Filipinos, and how much is there to-day?

Mr. QUEZON. It has been more than the intercourse between the Moros and the Americans.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from the Philippines has expired.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THETUS W. SIMS,
OF TENNESSEE,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 13, 1913.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper clippings, and so forth:

[From the Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer, February 2, 1913.]

THE WEIGHT OF OPINION.

Representative SIMS, of Tennessee, one of the most vigorous opponents of the toll-exemption clause in the Panama Canal bill, seeks to overwhelm his associates with a display of the weight of public sentiment. Mr. SIMS has gathered opinions from many of the leading men of the United States outside of political life, has condensed these statements to three or four lines each, and put them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Reduced to fine print, they occupy 10 spacious pages of the official publication.

One interesting part of Mr. SIMS's collection presents the views of 114 college presidents. The list includes most of the leading educators of the United States. Among those from Ohio are President Thwing, of Western Reserve; President Stevenson, of Ohio Wesleyan; President Thompson, of Ohio State; President King, of Oberlin; and President Holden, of Wooster. Without exception, these men speak in terms of strongest condemnation of the congressional violation of national obligations, and most of them specifically urge the repeal of the objectionable portion of the Panama act.

It is also to be noted that newspaper comment throughout the United States has been in opposition to the exemption feature of the canal bill, with a unanimity almost unprecedented. Independent papers, "organs" of both the old parties, and journalistic devotees of the new party have united in decrying the passage of the bill, and are now with almost equal vigor calling upon Congress to follow the lead of Senator ROOT and correct the error.

The nonpartisan congressional majority which put through the Panama bill seems to be representative of no element and no party. Popular disapproval is so unmistakable that it should have its weight in forcing a reconsideration of the measure.

PANAMA AND SUBSIDIES.

Secretary Knox's blunt admission in his letter to Sir Edward Grey that "the exemption of the coastwise trade from tolls, or the refunding of tolls collected from the coastwise trade, is merely a subsidy granted by the United States to that trade" ought to open the eyes of the Democrats in both branches of Congress to the deception which they practiced upon themselves when they voted for the tolls provision of the Panama Canal act. There is no issue on which Democratic Senators and Representatives have been more united than in their opposition to ship subsidies. They have been aligned almost solidly against even the modest postal subventions, through the authorization of which it was hoped to establish better lines of communication with South America, China, Japan, and Australia, and their leaders have thundered time and again against the iniquity of voting money out of the Treasury to sustain either American industry or the American merchant marine. Yet under the guise of a discrimination in favor of coastwise American shipping passing through the Panama Canal they have helped to grant that shipping what Secretary Knox rightly calls a "subsidy."

It is amusing to note the rhetorical expedients which Democratic leaders employ to cover up the fact which Mr. Knox concedes. Senator O'GORMAN in his speech last Wednesday invented a curious paraphrase to describe the subsidizing transaction, and the circumlocution pleased him so much that he used it at least four times. He said: "It is true that when we passed the act we did not expressly provide, in declaring that no tolls should be levied upon American vessels, that those tolls should be entered as a credit upon the interest charge of the Nation against the enterprise, but doubtless Congress had it in mind." That has an air of banking subtlety about it which might be expected to hypnotize the man in the street. But reduced to ordinary phraseology what does it mean, except that the United States is to pay coastwise shipping tolls out of its own pocket, making the owners of that shipping a present to an amount equivalent to the sum entered as a credit on the canal's interest charge?

When the canal bill conference report passed the Senate on August 16 last, 30 Democratic Senators voted for it and no Democrat voted against it. Even JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, to whom the mention of a subsidy to any interest, domestic or nondomestic, is as a red rag to a bull, joined in granting direct financial aid from the Treasury to coastwise shipping. Now that the State Department has proclaimed to the country exactly what they were doing it is hard to see how Democratic Congressmen can successfully conceal their apostasy behind the O'GORMAN screen of "crediting the tolls of domestic ships upon the interest charge of the United States against the world."

THE PANAMA TOLLS BLUNDER—THE VOICE OF THE COUNTRY FOR REPEAL.

Recent systematic efforts to ascertain the opinion of the country on the exemption of our coastwise shipping from Panama tolls have shown substantial unanimity in favor of its repeal. The action of Congress, taken in the oppressive and politically distracting days of August, when, as a distinguished Senator has said, no one in Washington was able to judge the matter reasonably, is regarded everywhere, in the cool detachment of second thought, as a plain repudiation of our treaty contract with Great Britain that "tolls and conditions" shall be alike to all nations. When the consensus of these opinions shall have been published it will be discovered to glow with indignation that the national honor should have been held so lightly. The repudiation has been repudiated. Not only the press, which from the beginning has been overwhelmingly on the right side, but presidents of universities and colleges, superintendents of schools, clergymen, chambers of commerce, publicists, lawyers, and many others have spoken in no uncertain voice on this question of supreme and urgent importance. When a matter is one of both right and policy, you insult the person to whom you appeal if you do not place the ethical consideration first. In this regard the record of the country is something to be proud of. Whoever may be confused, Americans at large see clearly that the main issue is the national honor.

To those who "can not see" that any question of honor is involved it may be pointed out that the undeniable injury to our prestige both abroad and at home is one which, counted merely in dollars, is beyond estimate. The exemption is excused as a measure of national defense; it is just the opposite, for there is nothing so powerful in national defense as national prestige, which not only gives us strength in peace but support in war. In what plight should we be in any future war (which Heaven forfend!), or in any future diplomatic negotiations, if we alienate the friendship of the nations by an exhibition of Punic faith? In such matters honesty is not only the best policy, but the only policy.

We can not believe that national legislators can long be blunt to the higher considerations involved or deaf to public opinion. No public man can successfully contend against the conscience of the country. We believe that the tide is turning in Congress, but every day's delay in the repeal is an aggravation of the first error.

If it were done when 'tis done, then 'twere well it were done quickly.

A POINT THAT SENATOR ROOT OMITTED—PROF. WAMBAUGH ON WHY WE MUST LOSE THE CANAL CASE ON GROUNDS OF ORDINARY LAW—THE QUESTION.

A "trust for mankind" is what President Cleveland in a message termed such an enterprise as the Panama Canal. The question just now is whether such a trust is administered properly by giving to vessels engaged in the coasting trade of the United States a total exemption from tolls. It should be noticed that the question is not whether the tolls of such vessels may properly be paid out of the National Treasury—in which case the burden would be borne by all residents of the United States through the internal revenue, the tariff, and other taxes, and the benefit would be enjoyed initially by the treasury of the Panama Canal and eventually by all persons whom the canal may serve. No; the question is whether, in the words of the Panama Canal act of 1912, "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States."

This question is to some extent dependent upon treaty, but as a basis for understanding the whole matter it is essential to remember that a treaty is made in the light of existent national and international law, practice, and discussion. Hence, the treaty itself may well be laid aside until after the presentation of other matters.

THE LAW OF ENGLAND AND AMERICA AS TO PUBLIC CALLINGS.

Let us begin at the beginning.

When a person builds a private railway on his own land he has a right to exclude all persons from using it and to exact any compensation he may see fit from any person to whom he may from time to time grant the occasional use of this private railway. Yet as soon as he holds out his railway as ready to serve the public he finds that the law now places upon him a new series of duties. This may be a surprise to the owner, for, naturally enough, he thinks that as long as he does not so use his property as to injure other persons he may use it as he pleases, continuing to exclude some persons from the advantages of the property and granting to other persons those advantages on any terms he may choose, whether those terms are identical or are discriminatory and whether they give him an enormous compensation or not. His natural belief as to this matter is wholly in conflict with American and English law. From the time when he holds out his railway as a means of serving the public he is held by the courts to have entered upon a public calling, and he is thereafter compelled by the courts to perform some peculiar duties, of which it is enough for the present purpose to specify three—the duty of serving all comers, the duty of serving all comers on the same terms, and the duty of charging only a reasonable rate.

It is not necessary to give in full the reasons upon which these rules of law are founded; but those to whom these rules come as a surprise may wish to know some of the reasons. Briefly, then, one of the reasons is found in the importance to the public of such service as this, and another is found in that discouragement of building other railways which arises from the building of this one. In other words, the public needs the service of a railway, and danger of competition from this one tends to prevent the building of another; and hence, unless this one can be compelled to give its chosen service fairly, the public will really suffer an injury.

The burdens, it should be repeated, are not cast upon this owner without his consent. If he had chosen, he might have carried on his railway wholly for himself, unless and until it should be taken from him by right of eminent domain; but by announcing his railway as open for the public he has assumed a new and peculiar position to which the law attaches special duties, and, among others, those enumerated duties of serving all, of serving without discrimination, and of serving at reasonable rates.

AN IMPORTANT DOCTRINE.

This is the important doctrine upon which rests a great part of the power of the State and national commissions which deal with railways and other public callings. It is indeed one of the most important of the doctrines by which public welfare is secured without departure into socialism.

The peculiar duties attaching to those entering upon a public calling belong not only to individuals but also to incorporated companies—and to incorporated companies more clearly than to individuals, because the incorporated company owes its very existence to that public which incorporated it. Besides the incorporated company engaged in a public calling sometimes receives and uses that right of taking private property which is termed "eminent domain"; and, as the right of eminent domain can not be exercised save by a government or under a grant given by a government, and whenever exercised must be used for public purposes, the mere exercise of the power of eminent domain carries with it the assumption of the duties of public service as to the property thus acquired.

Again, a municipal corporation which builds a railway for public use incurs the same duties, and, still more clearly, for the municipal corporation is created by the State as an instrumentality for nothing but the public service.

Further, as a State is created by the people for public service exclusively, a State's railway, unless used exclusively by the State government itself or by county or municipal governments, must be subject, as a matter of principle, to precisely similar duties. It is true that a State government, as distinguished from its officers, can not be sued without the State's consent, and that hence a State may enjoy practical immunity from suit, but the absence of a remedy can not blind anyone to the fact that a State owes duties, and the duties which the State imposes in behalf of the public against individuals and incorporated companies and municipalities can not honorably be said by a State to be nonexistent as duties of the State simply because the State may have supplied no machinery whereby the State itself can be subjected to compulsion.

THE GOLDEN RULE OF GOVERNMENT.

Finally, in case the United States should build a railway, other than for the use of troops or for some similar end, resembling that to which a private individual for his own private purposes might devote a railway of his own, the United States, as matter of principle, must come under the same duties attaching to a public calling—the duty of serving all, of serving equally, and of serving on reasonable terms. It is true that the United States can not without consent be sued in any court, whether the court be State, national, or international, and that hence there is no means known to ordinary law of enforcing such an obligation as this, and that thus, in a sense, the duty is merely moral; but some merely moral duties are perceptible by the law, and surely a duty precisely like one which the National Government enforces in its own courts against others can not, in case it rests upon the National Government itself, be termed in any abusive or disrespectful or minimizing sense a merely moral duty. Perhaps analytical jurists may say properly enough that there is no duty unless there is a whip behind it, but a nation can not say this with self-respect.

It follows, then, that if the United States enters upon any business belonging to the class called public callings, there rest upon the United States, as matter of principle, the same duties which belong to others who enter upon such callings—the duties of serving all, of discriminating against none, and of serving at a reasonable rate. It should be understood that such duties derogate in no way from the full powers of Government. Now, as to the places where the United States may carry on these undertakings, the United States must continue to have full power of keeping the peace and all the other powers for which governments are organized; but by entering upon a career essentially nongovernmental it would have assumed as to nongovernmental matters—in this instance as to some sort of business belonging to the class of public callings—the duties belonging to all other conductors of such callings.

THE CANAL AS A "PUBLIC CALLING."

And what are public callings? That is a difficult question to answer; but it is enough for the present purpose to point out that by both reason and authority the character of a public calling attaches to a canal. Indeed, a canal is a somewhat clearer instance than a railway; for canals, having preceded railways, were earlier examples of public calling; and, besides, a canal, more obviously than a railway, renders unlikely the building of a competitor in the same neighborhood and for the purpose of meeting the same need.

Thus, independently of any treaty, one reaches the conclusion that by the rules of law observed in the United States and England, the United States, whenever owning a public canal, is, as matter of principle, under the duty of permitting the canal to be used by all comers, and at rates which do not discriminate, and at rates which are reasonable.

And what are reasonable rates? On the one side it is clear that the total amount of income is not unreasonable if it simply pays cost of operation and of depreciation, a fair interest on the investment, and a sum equivalent to insurance against disaster. On the other side, it is clear that a total income greatly in excess of this would be unreasonable. What is more difficult is to determine the reasonableness, not of the total income but of specific rates. On this last point it is, however, easy to see that any rate which causes the person paying it to bear more than his fair share is unreasonable. That is, in fact, another mode of reaching the undoubted result that rates must not be discriminatory; for, at least in cases where an enterprise is dependent wholly upon receipts, the exempting of some users carries with it the burdening of others. Yet it is unnecessary to go through this mode of reaching the result, for the duty of any pursuer of a public calling to abstain from discrimination is a duty which rests firmly enough on its own separate foundation of justice.

THE PROFESSION IN THE TREATY.

Thus far there has been no mention of the question whether the United States can be said to have made, as to the Panama Canal, an announcement of public service. Everyone knows that there is such a profession in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901. The words of the treaty will be given hereafter; but thus far it has seemed enough to show, without reference to international treaties, presidential messages, and the like, that if the United States, as owner of the Panama Canal, does make an announcement of public service, there rests upon the United States, as matter of principle, an obligation, as close to a legal obligation as can rest upon a Government, to serve all comers, to serve them alike, and to serve them fairly.

Independently of treaty, it must be recognized as a sound general principle that when a nation enters upon a business which is nongovernmental it assumes toward its own citizens and toward the citizens of other nations duties similar to those owed by private individuals engaged in similar business, and more specifically that this is true as to those businesses which are deemed public callings. It is not, however, in the present instance necessary to insist that such duties bind a nation in the absence of a treaty. It is enough to point out that certain peculiar duties attach to individuals engaged in certain occupations, and then to insist that both the declarations of public officials and the words of treaties must be read in the light of the peculiar duties recognized and enforced against individuals by the ordinary law of the countries in interest.

THE DOCUMENTS PRECEDING THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

It is now time to turn to the documents which led up to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901. Do those documents show that the United States deemed it inappropriate for an interoceanic canal to be subject to the ordinary rules applicable to public callings? The very words of the essential documents must be quoted, and this will now be done.

In 1826, Henry Clay, Secretary of State, instructed the delegates to the Panama Congress that if a canal should ever be constructed through the Isthmus, "the benefits of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls."

Again, in 1835, there was a resolution passed by the Senate, "that the President of the United States be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of other nations * * * for the purpose of * * * securing forever * * * the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established, to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking and complete the work."

In 1839 the House of Representatives adopted a similar resolution, requesting the President "to consider the expediency of opening or continuing negotiations * * * for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of effecting communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus and of securing forever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations."

In the treaty of 1846, ratified in 1848, New Granada, now Colombia, "guarantees to the Government of the United States * * * that no other tolls or charges shall be levied or collected upon citizens of the United States * * * over any road or canal that may be made by the Government of New Granada, or by the authority of the same, than is, under like circumstances, levied upon and collected from the Granadian citizens"; and the purpose of this treaty is explained in President Polk's message to the Senate in 1847, thus: "Neither the Government of Granada nor that of the United States has any narrow or exclusive views. The ultimate object * * * is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus."

THE "EQUAL-TERMS" STIPULATION.

In 1850 the Clayton-Bulwer treaty between Great Britain and the United States, having in mind chiefly a canal through Nicaragua, agreed that neither of the two countries will hold, "directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other," and that each of them "shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans, for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all," and that the treaty shall extend in principle to any canal or railway across the Isthmus, and that it is understood "that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford."

In 1858 Lewis Cass, Secretary of State, in writing to the United States minister to Central America, said: "The progress of events has rendered the interoceanic routes across the narrow portions of Central America vastly important to the commercial world. * * * While the just rights of sovereignty of the States occupying this region should always be respected, we shall expect that these rights will be exercised in a spirit befitting the occasion and the wants and circumstances which have arisen. Sovereignty has its duties as well as its rights, and none of these local governments * * * would be permitted, in a spirit of eastern isolation, to close these gates of intercourse on the great highways of the world, and justify the act by the pretension that these avenues of trade and travel belong to them, and that they choose to shut them, or, what is almost equivalent, to encumber them with such unjust regulations as would prevent their general use."

In the same year Mr. Cass, writing to the British minister to the United States, said as to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty: "The principle was that the interoceanic routes should * * * be neutral and free to all nations alike."

BLAINE'S STAND.

In 1881 James G. Blaine, Secretary of State, wrote to the United States minister to Great Britain that while certain modifications were desired in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the United States "frankly agrees and will by public proclamation declare at the proper time, in conjunction with the Republic on whole soil the canal may be located, that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations for the use of the canal, shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation."

Thus far the documents unanimously indicate recognition of those duties which pertain to all public callings. Only one document of a contrary tenor has been discovered. That is the projected convention of 1884 between Nicaragua and the United States. That convention provided for equal tolls for all nations excepting coastwise vessels of the two parties to the convention. Yet this convention was withdrawn by President Cleveland from consideration by the Senate; and thus the record remains unbroken down to the Hay-Pauncefote treaties.

Finally the Suez Canal convention of 1888, to which the United States was not a party, provided that "The Suez Maritime Canal shall always be free and open * * * to every vessel * * * without distinction of flag," and that "the high contracting parties, by application of the principle of equality as regards the free use of the canal, a principle which forms the basis of the present treaty, agree that none of them shall endeavor to obtain with respect to the canal territorial or commercial advantages or privileges in any international arrangements which may be concluded."

The Suez Canal convention may well serve as an introduction to the Hay-Pauncefote treaties; but it is hardly necessary for that purpose, for the American and English law as to public callings and the documents of the United States prior to the Hay-Pauncefote treaties, as has been shown, throw adequate and harmonious light upon the probable intent underlying those treaties. It now remains to inquire whether the treaties use language which overthrows the doctrines of public calling which anyone acquainted with law and with diplomatic history would expect to find recognized in them.

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY OF 1901.

So much for English and American law and the chain of documents prior to the Hay-Pauncefote treaties, to which treaties discussion frequently is restricted.

The terms of the unratified Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1900, and of the ratified Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 now in force, are practically identical in all passages even remotely pertinent to the question of tolls.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 expressly superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and said:

"The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say: 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable. * * * No change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

In the light of English and American law as to public callings the words of this Hay-Pauncefote treaty—"open to vessels of all nations," "on terms of entire equality," "no discrimination," "charges just and equitable"—sound not unfamiliar. In truth, those passages of the treaty are much like extracts from the opinions of English and American courts.

As has been pointed out, the United States, when it enters upon a world-wide public calling such as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty describes, might well be held, even without treaty stipulations, to have assumed the duties which are created by the law prevalent in the United States as to such a calling. As government has established for private individuals engaged in a public calling the rule of equality and justice, a government, even though it be not under the duty of being more just than the private individual, will have to give reasons of extraordinary strength for holding that when it itself conducts a public calling the rule may be inequality and injustice.

Again, whatever might be the duties of the United States in the absence of a treaty, the system of law used by both England and the United States furnishes the natural and necessary introduction and commentary for any treaty between these countries. This system has in it for public callings a doctrine requiring equality and reasonableness.

Further, as to an isthmian canal this doctrine has been assumed and recognized and asserted by the United States from the beginning.

Finally, this doctrine is the very essence of the words in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. If the treaty were silent as to the matter, the general law of England and the United States, and also the uniform recognition of the doctrine of equality in the past by the President, the Secretary of State, the Senate, and the House of Representatives would make it difficult to insist that mere silence in the treaty would authorize the opposite policy of discrimination; but the treaty deals with the matter expressly and deals with it in harmony with what was to have been expected from the previous course of American and English law and of negotiation.

For the reasons given, it seems practically impossible not to come to the conclusion that the United States must give the services of the Panama Canal to all merchant vessels and without discrimination and on reasonable terms.

Hence, as the analogies of the law prevalent in the United States and England require uniformity and as the current of official declaration from the beginning requires uniformity, and as the treaty in force requires uniformity, the exempting—as distinguished from the subsidizing—of vessels engaged in the coasting trade appears to be impossible—impossible because in this matter the United States, though free, like every sovereign, from the compulsion of ordinary courts, has the honor to be in a place of responsibility, managing "a trust for mankind."

[J. H. Beek, general secretary the St. Paul Association of Commerce.]

This organization is unalterably opposed to exempting coastwise vessels.

[I. W. Cook, secretary Commercial Club, Oskaloosa, Iowa.]

Without awaiting the formality of calling our board together, we think safe to venture the opinion that the sentiment hereabout is favorable to repeal provision of Panama Canal bill exempting coastwise trade.

[E. Trumbull Lee, Pittsburgh, Pa.]

I earnestly hope that Congress will refer this whole matter to an arbitration committee. It seems to me that that measure is of tremendous international importance, and that this method of treatment would show the fairness of the United States Government and its willingness to meet the final conclusions which would be reached by this international committee.

[James Atkins, Waynesville, N. C.]

To submit this matter to arbitration is simply to expose our Nation to defeat. It means that we shall have other people to decide for us what is right. We know and should not delay to repeal the "coastwise exemption." If we have sworn to our own hurt in the treaty, let us not change.

[J. D. Hammond, president Paine College, Augusta, Ga.]

You have my hearty indorsement of the movement to further the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal bill which would give exemption to our coastwise trade.

[A. Lawrence Lowell, President Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.]

I am certainly in favor of repealing the provision of the Panama bill remitting the tolls on American vessels, but I am not prepared to say that it is in contravention of our Hay-Pauncefote treaty, for that seems to me a question capable of two opinions. I agree wholly with Senator Lodge that whether it is in contravention of the treaty or not, it is highly unwise to do anything from a merely pecuniary motive which the other party to the contract believes to be in violation of its terms.

[Edmund J. James, President University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign, Ill.]

I am heartily in favor of the repeal of the provision in the Panama Canal act exempting American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls for passing through the canal.

It has always seemed to me that the United States made a serious mistake in ever making the Clayton-Bulwer treaty with Great Britain; a still greater mistake in making the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; but, having made these treaties, it is clear that we are bound by them until we denounce them in the proper form with due notice.

[Julian S. Selby, Stuart Robinson Memorial Presbyterian Church, Louisville, Ky.]

My sincere desire in reference to the "coastwise exemption" is that our Government may do that which will be honorable in the sight of God and man.

[N. B. McKinney, secretary board of trade, Greenwich, Conn.]

The "coastwise exemption" should be repealed. We can not afford to do otherwise.

[Richard J. Cooke, bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Portland, Oreg.]

I believe we should yield to the contention of Great Britain, and tax ourselves in the same way, to the same degree, as we tax all others. It may have been an unwise thing to have done, but with me the question is not whether it was wise or unwise, but what is right. However, there seems to be sufficient ambiguity in the whole situation as to warrant arbitration in order that there may be not only satisfaction abroad but quietness among our own people.

[J. S. Johnston, bishop of west Texas.]

If Mr. Hay meant, in wording the treaty, to put our domestic merchant marine on the same footing with foreign vessels, he made his first, only, and greatest mistake; but if he did, I am in favor of standing by the treaty as he made it.

[William Fraser McDowell, the Bishop's Room, Methodist Book Building, 14 West Washington Street, Chicago.]

There ought not to be two opinions upon the question of keeping our treaty agreements, not only in their letter but also in their spirit.

I wish very much that the provision of the Panama bill exempting the coastwise trade of the United States might be repealed. If that can not be done, I hope for the honor of this Government that the question of the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty will be submitted to arbitration.

[Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, director, All Souls Church, Chicago.]

The United States should guard its honor more than its prosperity. The small vantage that might accrue to "coastwise shipping" is petty compared to the greater advantage that will follow the open hospitality that invites the world to accept the Panama Canal as a free gift to international fraternity.

[Right Rev. Theodore D. Bratton, bishop of Mississippi.]

I do not as a rule comply with requests of this nature, but I am moved to express my hearty approval of the effort which is being made to secure the repeal of the "coastwise exemption" in the Panama bill.

As I understand the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which I have carefully read, it would be a repudiation of solemn obligations if the United States should make provision for the exemption of its own coastwise trade from the tolls which will have to be paid by the commerce of the world.

[Rev. William Horace Day, First Congregational Church, Los Angeles, Cal.]

I can see no reasonable ground for defending our national conduct unless we either repeal the exemption for coastwise trade from Panama Canal tolls or submit it to arbitration if there is any considerable ground for believing that the exemption does not conflict with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

[Joseph B. Moore, chief justice Supreme Court of Michigan.]

Congress should repeal the exemption of coastwise shipping from tolls.

[Robert Shaw Minturn, New York.]

All the friends of our country in foreign lands and all supporters of liberal republican institutions grieved last summer over the passage of the Panama Canal tolls bill as over some disaster which had befallen a cherished brother. On the other hand, those who dislike us and all that we stand for, who are at all points anti-American and antidemocratic, pointed gleefully to that action as a further confirmation of their most cynical opinions regarding the dishonesty both of Americans as individuals and of the United States Government.

Will the world's history make any excuse for us if, in the day of our prosperity and with wide-open eyes, we now repudiate a solemn international agreement, a written contract entered into for a valid consideration, on which the ink is barely dry?

I am absolutely opposed to any favoritism in the matter of tolls of the Panama Canal, for I can not appreciate any advantage that might accrue to our people, but rather a dissatisfaction due to such a discrimination. I am, however, simply expressing my personal opinion gained from a study of conditions.

[Wm. McCarroll, New York.]

Only the repeal of the law will fully maintain our standing.

[Amos R. Wells, managing editor the Christian Endeavor World, Boston.]

It is my decided belief that Congress should repeal the law exempting from Panama tolls our coastwise shipping. That industry does not at all need such a subsidy; if it did need it, the subsidy should be given in such a way as not to involve this country in dishonor. I am saying this repeatedly and emphatically in my paper.

[Meredith Nicholson, Indianapolis.]

The first faint outcry against the provision of the Panama Canal bill exempting American coastwise traffic from toll charges has deepened into a roar of protest. The exemption provision, if retained, is a blot upon the canal as a national achievement. Our Government has put itself in a hole and the quicker it crawls out of it the better. Certainly a reference of the matter to arbitration would have but one result, and that a humiliating one for the United States. Repeal the exemption clause is the only remedy that can save the national honor.

[Edwin M. Poteat, president Furman University, Greenville, S. C.]

I hope the exemption will be repealed; or, in the event that Congress refuses to repeal it, President Taft's suggestion that the question be submitted to arbitration will prevail.

[Thomas S. Perry, Boston, Mass.]

A prejudice in favor of common honesty leads me to hope that the Panama Canal bill may be purged of its offensive features. If they are wrong all will argue that they should be amended. If they are right we need have no fear of arbitration.

[George Ade, La Fayette, Ind.]

I was in England when our Government at Washington made public the new interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Whatever the actual gist of the contention, the English sincerely believe that we are trying to make them the victims of a slick Yankee trick. As a private citizen, desirous of retaining a proper pride in my native land, I say let all the questions at issue be submitted to arbitration. If we err at all, let it be in an overstrict adherence to both the letter and the spirit of the agreement.

[Charles F. Flagg, president board of trade, Portland, Me.]

It seems to me that with proper reservation of our rights of subsidy the measure ought to be repealed. The provision favors a traffic which will be enormously benefited, anyway, and is the one portion of our merchant marine which has no competition with foreign nations and enjoys a monopoly. When a measure of such doubtful justice will also involve us in a wrangle over treaties, and produce an attitude abroad which is liable to injure our foreign trade, it would seem that the possible benefits from this provision are overbalanced, and I hope that the maturer judgment of Congress may work out some dignified and fair agreement repealing this measure but protecting our rights of subsidy so that we do not run into any fresh difficulties.

[The Standard, Chicago, Ill.]

The Nation's honor at stake.

[Edward P. Bacon, of E. P. Bacon Co., grain commission merchants, Milwaukee and Chicago.]

I earnestly hope that Congress will rescue the honor of our country by immediately repealing the coastwise exemption of the bill fixing the tolls for the canal traffic. If not repealed, let us by all means submit the question to The Hague tribunal for arbitration.

[Winston Churchill, novelist, Santa Barbara, Cal.]

I am very glad indeed to add my word of protest against the action of Congress in the Panama Canal bill in exempting the coastwise trade of the United States. I believe, in this matter, that the honor of our Nation is at stake. It recalls to many Americans a time in our history which we would willingly forget—our dealings with Great Britain in treaty matters immediately following the War of the Revolution.

[Leslie's Illustrated Weekly, New York.]

We can't afford to sell our national honor for a canal toll exemption of a million dollars a year. In passing the exemption act last August for the benefit of our coastwise trade a tremendous mistake was made. Instead of trying now to convince ourselves and the rest of the world that what we did was justifiable, we should commend ourselves in the eyes of the nations by acknowledging we have made a mistake and promptly repealing the act.

[The Sun and News, Williamsport, Pa.]

By all means the subject should be submitted to arbitration, and it is to be hoped that with a better understanding of the situation Congress will vote for such arbitration if it does not repeal the exemption clause altogether.

[The Continent, continuing the Interior and the Westminster, Chicago.]

Circumstances seem to be shaping in this country toward an issue which will divide between jingo patriots and square-deal patriots with the exactitude of a judgment separation between goats and sheep. The question threatening to reveal the difference between the two is the matter of tolls on the Panama Canal as related to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The national shame resulting from such a defiant and graceless breaking of international faith—a craven breach prompted only by fear of losing certain money advantage not in the remotest degree associated with the vital interests of the Nation—would be a blot on the great seal of the Republic that would not be erased in a thousand years.

[The Troy Times, Troy, N. Y.]

A good name is better than riches, and to preserve the reputation of the United States as truthful and honorable is better than to add moneys to the treasury of its shipping interests.

[W. C. Bowers, superintendent of schools, Zanesville, Ohio.]

I favor repeal.

I do not feel well enough acquainted with the details of the "coastwise exemption" to offer an opinion on the matter. But I can say that I am strenuously opposed to any violation or evasion of our obligations under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

[Lemuel H. Wells, bishop of Spokane, Spokane, Wash.]

Our hearts swell with pride at the moral leadership of our country among the nations, and now we will undo it all if we repudiate the obligation of a solemn and sacred treaty.

[Rev. Naphthali Luccock, bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Helena, Mont.]

Let us maintain national honor at any price. Even though a stand might be made for our rights upon technical grounds, let us waive the consideration and give the world the benefit of the doubt, for the sake of the moral influence it will give us among the nations of the earth. One of the noblest chapters of our history was that made in connection with the Boxer rebellion in China, by reason of our brave and brotherly attitude toward China. Let us make another chapter equally great in the matter of the Panama Canal, and in a large way promote the good will and progress of the world.

[F. K. Brooke, bishop of Oklahoma, Oklahoma City, Okla.]

I am in favor of the repeal of the coastwise exemption provision, or, if not repealed, on its submission to arbitration at The Hague Tribunal.

I am strongly in favor either of repealing the Panama Canal bill in its provisions exempting the coastwise trade of the United States, or else of submitting the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to arbitration. We can not afford, as a Nation, even to appear to try to misconstrue or violate a treaty.

[J. B. Logan, secretary Chamber of Commerce, Annapolis, Md.]

It is the opinion of the Annapolis Chamber of Commerce that the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty should be adhered to and that the Panama Canal bill should be repealed to comply with the treaty.

[J. H. Beek, general secretary the St. Paul Association of Commerce.]

This organization is unalterably opposed to exempting coastwise vessels.

[Bliss Perry, Cambridge, Mass.]

I am strongly in favor of the repeal of the provisions of the Panama Canal bill which exempts from tolls the coastwise trade of the United States. The grounds for such a repeal have been stated by Senator ROOT in a way that seems to me unanswerable.

[James A. B. Scherer, Throop Polytechnic Institute, Pasadena, Cal.]

I feel very strongly that the coastwise-exemption bill should be repealed, and hope Mr. ROOT'S effort will succeed. I have an article in the Independent, of January 16, which closes as follows: "The iniquity of a subterfuge subsidy, under the pretext of free tolls to coastwise ships, must be removed and good faith demonstrated toward England."

[William B. Curtis, secretary Board of Trade, Dunkirk, N. Y.]

I am glad of the opportunity afforded me to express my deep conviction that Congress should immediately repeal the coastwise-exemption provision of the bill, for to insist upon this plain contravention of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty would mean to stultify ourselves in the eyes of the entire world. We who have been foremost in the advocacy of peace and arbitration should not at the first opportunity repudiate all our pretensions and exhibit ourselves to the world as willing, for a mere selfish advantage, to violate the plain terms of a sacred compact into which we had freely and deliberately entered with a generous and friendly neighbor nation.

[The Knickerbocker Press, Albany, N. Y.]

The people of this country want no clever, cunning, sharp practices in our dealings with other nations. The people of this country want the exemption laws of the Panama Canal bill repealed.

[The Outlook, New York.]

It would be more consonant with our dignity and more conducive to peaceful relations between Great Britain and the United States for Congress to repeal the provision for the free passage of coastwise vessels through the canal than to wait for the always uncertain results of an international lawsuit.

[Resolution of Chicago Peace Society, Charles E. Beals, secretary.]

Resolved, That in view of the fact that many loyal and thoughtful American citizens fear that the exemption of American ships using the Panama Canal from paying the tolls imposed on foreign ships may be a breach of treaty obligation, therefore the Chicago Peace Society hereby respectfully petitions the Members of the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States to submit the question to international arbitration unless the said enactment is rescinded.

[The Century Magazine, New York.]

Whoever may be confused, Americans at large see clearly that the main issue is the national honor. To those who "can not see" that any question of honor is involved it may be pointed out that the undeniable injury to our prestige both abroad and at home is one which, counted merely in dollars, is beyond estimate. The exemption is excused as a measure of national defense; it is just the opposite, for there is nothing so powerful in national defense as national prestige, which not only gives us strength in peace but support in war.

Resolved, That the members of the New York Peace Society hereby place themselves on record unequivocally as opposed to the violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by the provisions of the Panama Canal act which remits the tolls on American vessels, in contravention of the traditional understanding and the explicit agreement with Great Britain and the tacit agreement with all other nations that there shall be no discrimination in tolls or conditions. We respectfully urge upon Senators and Representatives in Congress the supreme importance of safeguarding the national honor thus imperiled and earnestly request them to vote for the repeal of the exemption.

And we call upon our fellow citizens throughout the country, without distinction of party, to lend their aid to the movement for repeal by making known through the press and in letters to their Senators and Representatives, and otherwise, their opposition to any course on the part of the Government which would not be becoming to the most scrupulous man of honor.

And in case the movement for repeal shall not be successful, we declare our conviction of the supreme necessity of referring the controversy to the decision of impartial arbitration.

Interstate Shipment of Intoxicating Liquors.

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. CARY,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 8, 1913,

On the bill (H. R. 17593) to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate-commerce character in certain cases.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to vote against this bill, and I desire to submit a few remarks concerning it, although I will state frankly that to my mind the very introduction of the bill and the discussion of its provisions on the floor of this House is just a little short of ridiculous. The membership of this House is composed of Congressmen elected by a majority of their constituents, who sent them here to represent certain definite political principles. Most of the Members are Democrats, some are Republicans, and one is a Socialist. In not one of the platforms of a party represented in this House is there a mention as to this kind of legislation, nor can you find in the public utterances of any of the distinguished public men who led any one of the political parties represented here any indication of interest in this question. It is a prohibition measure, pure and simple. The men and women who send petitions and write letters to Congressmen regarding it belong to a recognized political party which in the last campaign had a full national ticket in the field, which, as usual, was completely and signally ignored by the people of the country. It is therefore hardly necessary to dignify the bill under question by any notice whatever, and my only reason for doing so is that the principles involved in the bill and the arguments used in support of it are so subversive of every principle of liberty and equality upon which the security of this Republic depends that it is incumbent upon every man who believes in our American free Government, adheres to its ideals, and loves its institutions to protest as vigorously as possible against the battle that is now being waged against the personal liberty and constitutional rights of every American citizen.

The campaign in favor of this legislation has been a long and bitterly contested one. For over 10 years every resource of a clever and persistent lobby has been used to influence the membership of this House in favor of this most iniquitous legislation. Salaried agents and organizers of the various so-called temperance organizations have been traveling throughout the country, spreading the propaganda of prohibition and instructing various churches, organizations, clubs, and individuals in all kinds of methods of reaching their Congressmen and Senators, and seeking by petition, letter, and frequently by open threat to influence Members in favor of this sort of legislation.

It would seem that the clergymen, estimable ladies, highbrows, and others of the so-called strictly moral classes of our country would be able, if their cause was a just one and as sacred as they claim it is, to conduct it at least along lines of honesty and sincerity, but I doubt whether there is a single interest in the country whose legislative representatives use more misrepresentation and misstatement than do the lobbyists engaged in this propaganda, and certainly there is not a group of propagandists anywhere in the world that is more intemperate in language and methods, unless it might be the militant suffragette ladies that are making England ridiculous to-day.

One of the claims that our temperance friends make, in order not to scare away from the bill all men who have any love for personal liberty left, is that its passage will not prevent a citizen of a dry State to have liquors shipped to him for his own private use. A very slight examination of prohibition laws will show that this contention is utterly worthless. A State can, as the State of Iowa has done, pass a law that no one but certain defined parties can receive a shipment of liquor, and if they can stop any shipment of anything at all before it is delivered to its ultimate destination the veriest tyro in government can readily see how complete the interference with individual right will become and what a vicious precedent for future legislation affecting the personal liberties of our citizens.

As a matter of fact, there is no question in the mind of anyone who knows anything at all about the liquor business that, while the enactment of this bill will hamper or destroy respectable and honest dealers, brewers, and distillers, it will be a direct incentive and help to the moonshiner and illegal dealer in liquor and will, besides, open up new sources of revenue to the grafter and blackmailer which can not be estimated. Over and over again it has been proven, in spite of all the assertions of our temperance friends, that prohibition does not prohibit. There are to-day eight States in this country with prohibition laws, and a summary of the Government tax receipts issued in these States by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is instructive, to say the least. It is as follows:

The eight prohibition States are Georgia, Maine, North Dakota, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Kansas, and North Carolina.

In all of the other States of the Union liquor is sold under some form of license, regulation, and control.

The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1912, page 186, C, shows that in the following prohibition States these special-tax receipts to dealers were issued in number and in kind as follows:

GEORGIA.

Summing these up, it will be seen that in the eight prohibition States receipts were issued to 10,876 dealers in spirituous and malt liquors, which I think is pretty good evidence that the "rum devil" finds a prohibition State a pretty good place to cavort in. And, mind you, this does not take into account hundreds of moonshiners and bootleggers, which would make a staggering total.

I have heard many of our temperance friends say with some complacency that they preferred that the liquor business, if carried on at all, be carried on illegally, as this at least placed the stamp of criminality upon it, but I am pretty sure that the experience of anyone who has ever lived in a prohibition section of the country will bear me out when I state most emphatically that all methods of handling liquor illegally are far more dangerous to the health and morals of a community than any licensed system could possibly be.

In the first place, the effect upon the citizenship of the community is inestimably bad in that it produces a dangerous contempt for law. It is the proudest boast of our country that we are governed by laws and not by men, and a respect for law is the first essential of successful republican government. It follows, therefore, that when a law is passed so utterly repugnant to the feelings of the people that the best of citizens do not hesitate to break it there must inevitably arise a contempt for law the danger of which is incalculable.

The effect on the personal morality of a community is just as bad, for it is self-evident that the only person who will deal in liquor illegally will be a lawbreaker, and instead of an orderly saloon conducted by a reputable citizen you get a dive conducted by a divekeeper.

One of the further dangers, and this is also a very serious one, is the fact that the illegal traffic in liquors is almost invariably confined to liquors which are admitted to be the worst alcoholic drinks of their kind, even when the quality is good, and quality of the liquor sold in prohibition sections is notorious to everyone who has ever indulged in them.

There are few people indeed who have given the matter any serious and unprejudiced thought who will not admit that the use of beer and light wines is far less dangerous than the use of distilled spirits as a beverage, but it is readily understandable that it is next to impossible to keep for illicit sale beer, wines, and so forth, on account of their bulk and the difficulty in concealing them. A man with a capacious coat can carry enough half pints of bad whisky to furnish the means of intoxication for a good many men and do a right thriving business, but no one man could carry enough beer to quench the legitimate thirst of a very small party.

As a matter of fact, whenever our temperance friends have succeeded in obtaining any legislation they desired the result has been in each case evil and vicious in every way. We have seen above as to the result of the passage of prohibitive laws in eight States, and there are two other cases in which they were successful which demonstrate still more clearly the evils of sumptuary legislation, the elimination of the canteen from the Army, and the abolishment of the sale of beer in the Homes for old soldiers.

Practically the entire body of the officers commanding the Army of the United States, men, most of them, of temperate habits and many of them total abstainers, have always been and are to-day in favor of the maintenance of the Army canteen and allowing the sale of beer at posts of the Army. Against the vigorous protests of these men who, by training and experience, were certainly the best judges of what was best for our soldier boys, a law was passed abolishing the canteen, and to-day facts and figures prove beyond any doubt or question that the effect upon the morals, health, and discipline of the Army has been entirely bad. Around each post there have sprung up the lowest kind of dives, and instead of the pure and healthy beer the soldier could obtain amidst congenial and wholesome surroundings at his canteen, where the drinking could be regulated and ordered, he now dulls his brain and ruins his health with the vilest kind of whisky and comes into contact with debauchery and vice in its worst forms.

The increase in venereal diseases in the Army, as proven by the hospital records, is staggering, and, so far from decreasing the amount of drinking, it is also significant that the cases of alcoholism have also increased; and to a sober-minded man, who looks into the future and knows that the unborn children and children's children of these soldiers will suffer the taints of disease contracted as a direct result of the elimination of innocent pleasures and the driving of thousands of soldiers from the canteen to the brothel, it must be a warning that these misguided people who wish to bend human nature to their narrow prejudices are not to be trusted for advice on any of these questions.

The abolishment of the canteens in the old soldiers' homes was equally vicious, and its results have been equally deplorable. I can speak with direct personal authority on this phase of the question, as there is a soldiers' home in my congressional district, and I have had many opportunities for observation. While they had the canteen the old veterans would stay in the home, drink their few glasses of beer, and the money made by the home in this way was used to get them extra delicacies for the table and to furnish them from time to time with little entertainments. There was no incentive to drunkenness, and there was practically none. The soldiers were entitled by every right of justice and decency to drink what they pleased, as they had certainly never been asked to sign a pledge before enlisting, and I do not think that the most bigoted prohibitionist will venture to state that the Union could have been preserved by total abstainers. But the temperance people were inexorable. The arguments they used and the language they employed will burn in my memory as long as I live. I am just going to quote two sentences uttered by a woman lobbyist, a member of the sex to whom we look for kindliness, for sympathy with the weak and poor, and for admiration of the brave and true, even when they are old and poor and crippled. This estimable lady stated:

> In the other homes most of them looked like paupers and many of them like drunkards, which they really are. They ought to be in inebriate asylums; they should not be mixed up with the better class of men.

Do you realize the significance of this paragraph as showing the mental processes of a typical temperance advocate. These men to whom she refers are veterans; they are men who gave the best years of their young manhood to their country's service; who suffered and bled that the Union might be preserved, and on many a hard and toilsome march or on the battle field weakened their bodies and broke their health, and now in their old age are sick and poor and weak and are therefore to be abused as drunkards and paupers in the sacred name of temperance.

Another statement made by a lady temperance advocate was in reference to sights in the home at Dayton, and here once again I wish to call attention to the angelic disposition and the sweet love of humanity that these people show. This is the statement:

> I saw such sights at that canteen as I hope I may never see again; for example, a man whose eyes had been shot out in battle was led to the counter and a big schooner of beer put in his hands. I saw another man wheeled to the bar in a chair. That man could not go outside and get beer I am sure.

I submit that for downright inhuman heartlessness you could search a long time and not find the equal of the above. It would seem that association with temperance advocates has a rather blighting effect on the human soul when it could make a gentle woman give utterance to such deliberate cruelty as the above.

But justice, humanity, sympathy, and all of the attributes that make for nobility in human nature have but little space in the mental and moral make-up of this new race of philistines, and it seems as though it is at times almost impossible for them to show even the glimmerings of common sense. The same people are backing an excise bill for the District of Columbia which is just about as near the limit of rank injustice and hypocrisy as any legislative measure can go. This bill if enacted would leave less than a dozen saloons, a few large hotels, and perhaps two rich clubs. It is a piece of class legislation of the most vicious kind and would give privileges to one class of citizens while taking them away from another and would practically create a monopoly for a few people in the liquor business in Washington while the property rights of others would be taken from them by a process utterly indefensible from any viewpoint of law or civic morality.

Drastic legislation on the liquor question is never effective of good. We have a very strict Sunday closing law here in Washington and it is presumably well enforced, and yet I have seen on many a Sunday more intoxicated men on Pennsylvania Avenue from the Treasury to the Peace Monument than I have in the other six days of the week when the saloons are wide open, or in a year in Milwaukee, were they never close Sunday, Monday, or any other day.

Mr. Speaker, my stand in this matter is not in the interest of the brewer or distiller or liquor dealer. I come from a section of the country where almost the entire population is composed of emigrants and the children of emigrants. Our fathers came from many a far-off fatherland, leaving homes and friends and dear ones and crossing the broad ocean, beckoned on by the Stars and Stripes to a great and magnificent country. They came here because they wanted to live "in the light of freedom's day," and they settled down and reared their homes and raised the domes and spires of a great city on ground that once was trackless forest. I have been raised amongst these liberty-loving, God-fearing people; they have bequeathed to me and to my fellow citizens the priceless boon of personal liberty, and it is our duty as children of freemen to strive our utmost against any and all attempts to change either the letter or the spirit of our free institutions and to devote ourselves always to the task of keeping our beloved country in very truth forever the "land of the free and the home of the brave."

Italians Abroad.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HAMPTON MOORE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 10, 1913.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of the immigration question the necessity for labor upon the farm has constantly been in evidence. I am one of those who advocate an increased development of the soil and who hold the labor of the farm amongst the useful occupations meriting the highest and best attention of statesmen. In dealing with the "back-to-the-farm" movement we must necessarily consider the immigrant. Congestion in the large cities frequently arises from our failure to properly assist the newly arrived immigrant to the home and the opportunity that awaits him on the farm.

It is sometimes contended by the opponents of immigration that many of the newcomers will not depart from the cities, and are thus made to contribute to the distresses arising from a congested population. The Germans and the Scandinavians are amongst those who are generally excepted from this contention. The Italian also should be, for in many respects he has taken up large tracts of ground and is industriously engaged in its development. In garden and vineyard work and in fruit culture is this especially true. It is fair to say that associated societies of Jews are also engaged in the encouragement of farm life and that numerous schools and settlements have been established for this purpose.

WELCOME IN SOUTH AMERICA.

At the recent White House hearing for and against the Burnett-Dillingham immigration restriction bill many of these points were brought to the President's attention. With reference to the Italians, however, some facts were adduced which for lack of time were not submitted to the President. They embodied statistics, translated from Italian records by Mr. John J. D. Trenor, of New York, who has given much study to the problem of Italian immigration, and are of such interest that I desire to submit them for the information of the House.

The statistics are taken from the census of "Italians abroad," compiled by the Royal Italian Commission of Immigration in Rome, and show that 5,555,000 sons of Italy reside abroad—that is, abroad from Italy.

Of this total—

900,000 reside in Europe.
191,000 reside in Africa.
1,801,000 reside in North America.
4,500 reside in Central America.
2,638,000 reside in South America.
7,700 reside in Australia.

Those in North America are thus divided—

1,778,000 reside in the United States.
20,000 reside in the Dominion of Canada.
2,564 reside in Mexico.

It is a noteworthy fact, says Mr. Trenor, that the Italians residing in Turkey (prior to the war, of course) number more than 10,000, and that more than 100,000 Italians reside in Tunis.

The larger part of Italian emigration has been to South America; as a matter of fact, it reaches 1,000,000 in Argentina, 1,500,000 in Brazil, 100,000 in Uruguay, 13,000 in Chile, and 12,000 in Peru.

INDUSTRIOUS AND PERSEVERING.

From the foregoing statement it appears that while the Burnett-Dillingham bill discourages immigration, and particularly that from Italy, the South American countries are availing themselves of Italian immigration and have encouraged it to double the extent of the immigration to North America. The deduction is that our neighbors of Latin America appreciate the worth of the Italian immigrant and are putting him to good use. To a great extent he is contributing to the growth and progress of Argentina or there would not be a million of him in that country. It would also be idle to deny the value of the Italian's services to the United States. On the farm he is industrious and persevering. He acquires property and settles down with the community in which he lives. In the cities he also seeks to hold real estate. This ties him down to the duties and responsibilities of citizenship. The property-owning Italian is not of the Mafia. He is more apt to be its victim, and is therefore entitled to the protection and sympathy of all law-abiding people.

ASSIMILATE AND ACQUIRE PROPERTY.

In the district I represent in Philadelphia are very many Italians of the first and second generations in this country. They are firmly established in the business life of the city and have engaged in all the industries. Many of them have become manufacturers and merchants; some of them are musicians, artists, lawyers, physicians, and sculptors, occupying representative positions amongst the people generally. They have their own churches and their beneficial and patriotic societies, but they assimilate with the native population and no one challenges their industry. They not only deposit their savings in the city banks and trust companies, but they are themselves bankers in many instances. It is possible that some criminal may occasionally be detected amongst them, but there is no element of our population which is totally free from criticism in this respect, and nowhere are the offenses of the Italian lawbreaker more severely condemned than amongst the law-abiding Italians. One of the best evidences of the sincerity of the opponents of the illiteracy test in the Burnett bill is the fact that many Italians who have acquired real estate are obliged to make their mark when transferring property. This condition is very rare with Italians of the second generation, because the public-school system is intensely popular and effective in Philadelphia, but it illustrates that the reading requirement would work a hardship in the case of certain worthy immigrants.

ITALIANS DO NOT BEG.

I have seen the Italian immigrants on the farm and in the cities carrying their burdens and doing the drudgery that the second generation, because of American education, scorns to do. They have rugged ideas of industry and honor; they will pick the berries in the swamps and carry the faggots upon their heads, but they do not beg. Where two men with their families lived together in one house until the farm was cleared, one being more industrious than the other, I have seen them saw the house in half in order that each might have his share of the land and dispose of his half of the house as he saw fit. In the cities I have watched Italian bootblacks grow into real estate owners, providing from their savings for the families of the first generation of immigrants. I have seen the second generation of Italians advance in the trades and professions until some of them have become leaders. The men who appeared at the White House to speak for the Italians, when the Burnett bill was under consideration on Thursday last, were men of means and influence. They were real participants in the civil and business life of their respective States. They were mostly of Italian birth or Italian parentage.

ECONOMIC SIDE OF THE QUESTION.

There is an economic side to this question that is seldom discussed. The Italian immigrant works. He earns his way. There is a good deal of the native pride of the American Indian about him, with a greater respect for toil. The Italian works for what he gets and saves what he earns. There are certain natural attachments to the old country which he very properly respects. One of these is the support of relatives or dependents left behind. For sending his money back he is often criticized, but if the savings institutions in the large cities, or even the postal savings system, were carefully scrutinized, it would be found that the Italian immigrant also saves in the United States. Indeed he strives to save here in order that he may acquire property. The savings funds will amply attest this statement.

And then the opponents of the Italian immigrant have overlooked another factor on the economic side of the question. The Italian on the farm is a producer and stands with the desirable classes; but the Italian in the city is a consumer, and he is obliged to patronize the American producer. The American home market is the best market for producers in the whole world. It constitutes more than 90 per cent of the entire production of the country. Every industrious, law-abiding immigrant therefore is a purchaser to the extent of 90 per cent of what he consumes, and is therefore economically desirable.

OF
HON. WILLIAM D. B. AINEY,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 16, 1913,

On House resolution 840, paying tribute to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM W. WEDEMEYER, late a Representative from the State of Michigan.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Speaker, WILLIAM W. WEDEMEYER, statesman, scholar, lawyer, citizen, husband, father, friend. With no unequal emphasis in all his contacts he exercised high qualities.

Like radii, each characteristic fell not short of reaching the outer circle of well-rounded accomplishment, and each complemented the other. His honesty of purpose, his gentleness of heart, his inherent and studiously acquired powers of mind were of the fabric of the man and wore well, whether in the political, professional, or social circles of his activities. What he was in the full sunlight of his public career, he remained in the twilight of his own home. He had but one standard and this he applied more rigorously to himself than his sympathetic charity permitted him to do to others. He loved the good and pure and noble, and of him it might well be said: "Behold the upright man and just."

Not the sun of limited circumference, but its beams, penetrating to distant realms, touch far off worlds with life and light. It is not the man of inch-measured height and breadth, but the effulgence of a high and noble character whose rays radiate rare influence, which, illuminating the pathway of others, affects the destiny of men and nations.

WILLIAM W. WEDEMEYER'S life spanned the distances separating him from his fellow men, and he brought them within the touch of his keen mind and warm heart. The ubiquity of his generous sympathies paralleled his wide experience, deep learning, and rock-laid integrity.

Such a character is unique. It yields not readily to analysis; it must be felt. The song of birds, the hum of bees, the flutter of the butterfly, the tint of flower, the sheltering shadows of the mighty tree, the murmur of the brook, the roar of ocean are indivisible, and refuse a revelation of their best to the contracted eyes of peering science.

To seek to separate the man from his attainments, to differentiate between his accomplishments and his ideals, would be to lose the dominant note in the melody of his life. Whether in one walk or another—in Nation, State, or home—the motif was the same—he gave rich expression to a tried and experienced high-mindedness.

How may we lift up our sorrowing faces under our bereavement? With what consolation may we reconcile ourselves to this untimely loss? What philosophy is there to alleviate the deadening pain which such parting brings? It is difficult for finite minds to harmonize need and loss.

The great Nation, to the solution of whose problems in the interest of its people he had dedicated his efficient efforts; the large circle of friends and acquaintances who relied upon his wise counsel and warm-hearted assistance; the hallowed and loved circle of his own home find the solution hard.

Is it not because it is difficult for us to divest ourselves of our own desires? Work never ends, and ages would not be sufficient for any man to complete a task. Man's work is well done, then, when he has impressed upon it the mark and plane of high ideal whereby others coming after may find a guidance and an inspiration toward accomplishment.

My acquaintance lasted, it seemed to me, not longer than a fragrant day of blossoming spring. We were brought together through the instrumentality of a sympathetic and mutual friend upon my advent to the Halls of Congress. Many are the treasures which memory gives of the too-brief hours, when mind and heart rambled together along some chosen pathway of common interest, where I was permitted to see and feel and know the high and purposeful which linked his life to his country, home, and friends, and now makes me rich in the recollection of the last hour we spent together, when he sought me out and told me of unselfish aspirations, where others occupied chief part and place.

The Great Master who saw and understood the mystery of the human heart revealed the underlying principle of love. I may say, expressive of this truth, that hidden in my heart of hearts I retain this jewel of my great affection for his memory:

He was my friend.

Banking and Currency Reform, with Especial Reference to Extension of Credit to the Farming and Working Classes.

OF

HON. JOHN JOSEPH KINDRED,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 7, 1913.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 28283) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, as an introduction to my observations on the question of the necessity of the reform of our existing national banking and currency laws, with particular reference to the expanding needs of the great American farming and other legitimate smaller interests, I will here incorporate, in part, the proceedings of the House of Representatives on February 7, 1913, when H. R. 28283, the agricultural appropriation bill, was under consideration, and the following colloquy occurred during the speech by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK]:

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the consideration of this bill, I think it appropriate to discuss the question of farm credits and the important relation which that topic bears not alone to the interests of the farmers of this country, but to the food supply of the whole people.

Before the next Congress shall have expired there will be brought before it not only the matter of education for our agriculturists, but a consideration of the means of doing things which they know how to do.

The project of bettering the farmer's facilities for borrowing money in Europe has almost wholly been carried on by educating the farmer to help himself. The farmers have been taught to help themselves there by combinations of scattered small units of the citizens, who organize small banks. A sort of investigation at the present time has been started in several different directions—a partial review of which was contained in the President's message upon that subject—for the purpose of ascertaining how they borrow money and what rate they pay in Europe. I anticipate that the next move may be an attempt to adapt European conditions to American conditions. I warn gentlemen of this House that it will be wholly impracticable. The plan must take other forms.

* * * * * * *

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATHRICK. Certainly.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, the question that I desire to ask would perhaps be more apropos had it been put at the time the gentleman was reciting the details. I would like to add to the gentleman's suggestion that the farmer sometimes is asked to pay graft to certain directors of the bank, is he not, to pay a bonus on the loan?

Mr. BATHRICK. I suppose there are such cases. I do not think that is the rule, however. I believe the bankers of this country are, on the average, very honest and public-spirited people, and they are doing their banking business in a legitimate way. But that is not the subject. The subject is to do something to give the farmer better financial connection and lower his interest rate.

* * * * * * *

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATHRICK. Yes.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Ohio believe that the loans that are so much needed by the farmer, as well as by other classes of people in smaller business, would be facilitated if the national banking and currency law was so amended as to allow the national banks to make loans on real estate?

Mr. BATHRICK. I think they would; but I do not know how a national bank could safely lend money on real estate. The national bank takes deposits that are subject to demand at any time, and I do not see how such a bank can safely take over any great amount of land mortgages, because they are not sufficiently liquid to provide for withdrawals. Besides, this plan would not reduce the rate.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, could not the difficulty to which the gentleman refers be overcome by having the mortgage which is to secure the loan to the national bank issued in another form and underwritten by the bank, as a coupon bond, thereby constituting liquid security, which would be a liquid asset of the national bank?

Mr. BATHRICK. That is about the way it is done by the Crédit Foncier, of France. The Crédit Foncier issues a bond; or, more properly, a debenture. Those debentures have received a large sale, but I think mainly because they have a lottery feature connected with them that gives a premium to people who happen to draw the lucky debenture. You can not ingraft on the American system any lottery plan, and unless you do that I fear these debentures would be so far below par that people would not buy them.

Mr. Chairman, I ask to continue my statement without interruption.

I, as a member of the legislative subcommittee of the House Committee on Banking and Currency, on which I have had the honor to do some hard work, wish here to bring out, in as brief outline as possible, some of the chief considerations connected with these proposed reforms, which, if sanely yet progressively carried out, will prove of more importance to our people than any other legislative relief measure, not excepting tariff reduction, which is rightly regarded as urgent from the Democratic Party's viewpoint.

I shall necessarily, in order to apply the reform for the benefit of the farmer, have to discuss some of the general principles of the proposed changes in the general national banking and currency system; and in doing this I wish it distinctly understood that I am expressing my own individual views and am not presuming to speak in any sense for the Banking and Currency Committee or any other member of it.

Since this discussion is intended chiefly for consideration among farmers, toilers, and those engaged in small business, it is thought best here to present the matter in some of its phases, in a somewhat elementary way in a brief discussion and review of the existing banking and monetary system in the United States and to attempt, with modifications, an application of certain European rural credit systems to our own country. Since banking and currency deals with money or the equivalent of money or the promise to pay money in some form, it is well to define money.

DEFINITION OF MONEY AND STANDARD OF VALUE.

To define first that with which, in some form or its equivalent, legitimate banking is concerned, money is a commodity which mankind accepts in exchange for all other commodities and services, it being understood that all our paper circulating medium and all our smaller coins, either directly or indirectly, promises to pay money. In the case of paper money the promise is stamped on it, and in the case of the coins it is expressed in the laws. As Horace White well says, in his excellent work on "Money and Banking," "The difference between real money and a promise to pay money is the same as that between a meal and a meal ticket." A standard of value is a commodity which is universally accepted as a medium of exchange.

As is well known, many different articles in the earlier and present stages of the history of man have been, and still are, used as money or a medium of exchange, such as salt, beans, wampum, beaver, beads, and shells among certain old American Indian tribes and other ancients; tobacco and other crop commodities were universally used (legalized in 1727) as money by the English settlers in Virginia, and rice and other crops in South Carolina and other States.

But as Horace White further says:

Any portable article may answer the purpose of money; some commodities are more convenient than others. Mankind has experimented with many different ores and has selected gold as best. The selection has been made by tacit agreement, not by convention. In every exchange the gold is of the same value as the thing for which it is exchanged or is so considered by the trader.

This means standardization of money, and it is on this basis that the United States Government and every other nation of the first class maintains a "parity of value" or a fixed ratio of value between all its circulating media, whether gold or silver or other metal or other money.

COINAGE AND BANK-NOTE ISSUE.

The Government's stamp is merely a certification of the weight and fineness of the metal on which it is stamped, a United States silver dollar representing 412½ grains of silver, and a two-dollar-and-a-half gold coin quarter eagle representing 64½ grains of fine gold, and so forth.

LEGAL TENDER.

Money or anything else which can be lawfully used in payment of a debt expressed in terms of money, and which creditors (including creditors of the Government) are required to accept, is called legal money or currency or legal tender. Gold and silver have been made legal tender by the United States Congress at certain ratios. Since, then, gold is the basic standard of value the world over, the production or nonproduction of gold must, of course, have a direct bearing on the total amount of money in circulation.

LIMITED CIRCULATION.

This limitation of money circulation in the United States is further restricted by the total amount of 2 per cent bonds issued by the United States Government, which is the sole basis for the bank-note issue in this country. In other words, every dollar over $700,000,000 in money circulating in the United States is backed by the same amount of United States Government bonds—2 per cent bonds at par—and kept constantly on deposit in the vaults of the United States Treasury as security for such bank-note issue.

LACK OF ELASTICITY AND THE REMEDY.

This, among other causes, brings us to the reason for the lack of elasticity of note issue or money circulation in this country and to consider the remedy or remedies for this condition of inelasticity, which at times has brought on, and will in the future, if uncorrected, bring on, woes worse than wars—disastrous panics.

Before going further into full explanations for this self-evident fact, we shall survey briefly the history and evolution of banking and currency in the United States.

HISTORY AND EVOLUTION OF BANKING AND CURRENCY IN UNITED STATES.

Established in 1863, the national banking system has remained until the present time practically unchanged by legislation, with the exception of a change in important particulars by a Federal act of June 24, 1864, a period of nearly 50 years. Innovations during this period were such as were demanded by extraneous features of national policy, such as the periodical refunding of the public debt, redemption of the greenbacks, and others connected for the most part with the unusual needs of the Government in this direction. But the fundamental plan of banking for which this system now stands is exactly what it was at its beginning.

FIRST AND SECOND UNITED STATES BANKS.

Wide dissimilarity of conditions exist now (telegraph, telephones, railroads, etc.) from those existing when the first and second United States banks existed. The advocates of a powerful national central bank try to get arguments from the workings of the second United States banks, claiming that the second bank was superior to any other, then or previously existing in the United States. Our knowledge of the operation of the first bank is very limited, all reports of the operations having disappeared. The history of the two banks is very unlike because of the different circumstances of the country at the respective different periods of their existence.

The establishment of the second bank was largely for the purpose of again bringing about payments, after the suspension of payments occurring in 1814.

The first bank never had any such task. The efforts of the second bank to actually bring about specific payments resulted in deadly hostility on the part of the State banks which had already been in working accord with the first United States bank. Moreover the second bank carried on operations on a much wider territory than did the first bank, the second bank having 25 branches, many of which were in the interior, and the first bank only 8, all of the latter being on the Atlantic border.

The two banks likewise conducted business of a different character, the first bank loaning to merchants in the great seaport cities, who have duties to pay, the second bank loaning almost entirely to merchants in the interior. The population and wealth of the country in the second period were greatly more than in the first; notwithstanding these differences the fundamental differences of the two banks was similar. The methods used by the two banks as to the currency problem of the country were identical. The national banking system has developed so that there are at the present time considerably over 7,000 national banks, having a total capital of $944,642,067 and a total surplus of $597,981,875. All the State banks and trust companies in this country, competing with the national banks, have an aggregate capital of over $416,059,900 and deposits amounting to over $2,466,958,665.

WEAKNESS OF PRESENT NATIONAL BANKING SYSTEM.

It stands to reason that a banking system of a rapidly developing country like ours could not serve its best purposes for a half century without substantial modifications and additions, and these not having been made, it follows that our present banking and currency laws are not only obsolete and inadequate but dangerously encourage panics. Perhaps nothing could have demonstrated this more fully than did the panics of 1903 and 1907, during which it was strikingly shown that this system could not bear, without collapse, any beyond the ordinary strain.

REMEDIES FOR EXISTING EVILS IN BANK-NOTE ISSUE.

We have already merely alluded to the basis of bank-note issue now in circulation—the basis of United States Government 2 per cent bonds—and the consequent restriction or inelasticity of money because of the limited issue by the Federal Government of these bonds, which under certain conditions are refundable for United States Government 3 per cent bonds.

The plain and effective remedy for this lack of elasticity is to change existing laws so that every bank note issued could be backed by about 33 per cent of gold, 33 per cent of United States bonds, and 33 per cent of the best commercial paper, and also backed by the whole assets and capital of the national or other banks of issue. This would obviously lead to a large and safe expansion of money or note issue, sufficient to meet the large seasonal demands of the great crops and business of the United States. I would allow all State banks as well as trust companies that come up to national requirements as to reserves, and so forth, to avail themselves of the privileges of bank-note issue under proper Government regulations.

BANK RESERVES.

This brings us to consider the proper and safe reserves that banks should carry as a protection to their depositors and creditors. All banks to which I would give the power to issue bank notes, and all other banks, should be stringently required to carry safe reserves at all times, either in their own vaults or in the vaults of a regional reserve association, created by the member banks of such reserve association, or bankers' banks; and I would divide all the banks in the United States into about 20 or 25 regional reserve associations.

PROPOSED REGIONAL RESERVE ASSOCIATIONS.

I would suggest that such regional reserve associations do a full banking business with every other reserve association, and that all the reserve associations be rigidly examined by United States Government Treasury officials. These banks should at all times maintain in the way indicated safe reserves of from 15 to 25 per cent of the amount of their deposits.

ALDRICH CENTRALIZED RESERVE SCHEME.

I am unalterably opposed to the highly centralized reserve association (National Reserve Association) proposed by the National Monetary Commission and its chairman, ex-Senator Aldrich, because it would dangerously centralize the control of all our money and credit in the hands of a comparatively few big bankers in this country. This conclusion is borne out by the results of the recent hearings before the Money Trust inquiry subcommittee of the House Committee on Banking and Currency, and also by a close and careful study of the so-called Aldrich scheme.

A FEDERAL BOARD OF CONTROL.

A Federal board of control, with or without capital, could well be created as a necessary mechanism to supervise both reserves and note issue as between all the proposed regional reserve associations. Such a board should consist, ex officio, of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the United States Comptroller of the Currency, of the United States Comptroller of the Treasury, and of at least three additional and paid members selected by the President of the United States.

There are many other essentials, brought out at the interesting hearings before our legislative subcommittee of the House Banking and Currency Committee, that should be incorporated in a sane, progressive monetary-reform bill, relating to guaranty of deposits, the regulation of bills of credit, acceptances, and finance generally, but which I can not further discuss here for lack of space.

EMERGENCY MONEY.

I will refer, however, to the absolute necessity, if a comprehensive monetary reform in the United States is not forthcoming, of perfecting and effectuating some such plan for providing emergency money in panics and in other times of stress, as the so-called Vreeland emergency law, or some similar measure, $500,000,000 being now provided for this purpose under the Vreeland law.

EUROPEAN SYSTEMS.

I am of the opinion, after studying all the European banking systems, especially those of England, Germany, and France, that we can not profitably incorporate any of them bodily in our monetary laws, as they are not suited to the business habits and needs of our country, with its immense seasonal and crop demands for expansion of money. I do not here refer to European rural credit systems.

CONTRACTING THE CURRENCY.

Of course too much elasticity of the currency may lead to dangerous expansion, and to avoid this a systematic tax on issue in certain cases should be so adjusted as to accomplish the prompt retirement of redundant currency.

GUARANTEE OF DEPOSITS.

Many qualified experts in banking and currency from all parts of the country have testified as to their opposition to the principle of compelling by law all the banks, or groups of banks, to guarantee the deposits of all the other banks or groups of banks, on the ground that careful, conservative banks should not, in common justice, be compelled to guarantee the deposits of less soundly conducted banks, which through unsound methods are so conducted as to lose their depositors' funds. But, on the other hand, former Gov. Haskell, of Oklahoma, has personally assured me, in a long conversation on the subject, that the Oklahoma State law, enacted while he was governor, compelling all State banks to contribute to a fund for the purpose of guaranteeing the depositors of those banks, had worked well in that State and that the banks there did not complain of the provisions of such a law. This statement, on the other hand, is strongly criticized by others, who maintain that this law in Oklahoma has proven worse than a failure. Many well-informed citizens of the State of Texas, including some of the most conservative bankers in the State, have stated that a similar law in Texas had worked to the protection of depositors and to the satisfaction of the banks.

In Texas the law provides that the State banks can exercise an option in providing the guarantee of depositors by either contributing to the common fund for the purpose or by executing a liability bond guaranteeing deposits satisfactory to the State authorities.

APPLICATION OF BANKING AND CURRENCY TO THE NEEDS OF THE LABORING AND POORER CLASSES.

At this period of the evolution and progress of our country, especially toward the betterment of the working classes, every effort is being and should be made, by statesmen and philanthropists alike, to raise the social standing and improve the material condition of the industrial classes. Such efforts have been successful in Great Britain, France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Belgium, Spain, and Portugal through the establishment and workings of an institution which has proved more helpful than any other in attaining the desired ends, but which in our country has attracted almost no attention. We refer to People's Banks or cooperative banks, which in different forms have worked so well in Europe in the interests of these classes. Some of these foreign banking methods may not prove suited to us and our methods, but some of them may well be tried.

The most useful and workable of these in Germany are the Schulze-Delitzsch and Raiffeisen systems or "People's Banks" and others already referred to. As to the excellent workings of the system and of these types, I will quote David Lubin, delegate of the United States International Institute of Agriculture, as follows.

RURAL BANKS IN GERMANY—THE RAIFFEISEN SYSTEM.

In the first half of the past century the small farmers and small artisans of Germany, who could not have recourse directly to capitalists or to banks, suffered severely at the hands of the usurers from whom they procured the credit which was indispensable to the exercise of their business. The seriousness of the situation, rendered more acute by the economic transition which was taking place and was bringing with it a great and urgent need of credit, was clearly recognized by two men, who have deserved well not only of Germany but of the whole civilized world by devising and putting into practice the best methods of remedying the evil. These were Frederick William Raiffeisen, burgomaster of Weyerbusch, and Francis Frederick Schulze, better known by the name of Schulze-Delitzsch. The former was the originator of the rural cooperative banks which have spread into all civilized countries, the latter of the urban popular banks.

These two forms of cooperative banks, although somewhat different in their organization, are based on the common fundamental principle of organizing the would-be borrowers themselves in order that they may obtain by combination the credit facilities which they would have sought individually in vain.

Such cooperation has made possible, on the one hand, the collection amongst the members themselves, in the form of shares or of small deposits, of a considerable amount of capital which serves to supply the credit requirements of their fellow members. On the other hand, the cooperative credit societies being regularly managed and subject to rigorous supervision, have been able to procure credit on favorable terms from outside sources of capital.

The credit given by the Raiffeisen banks, which are rural in character, and by the Schultze-Delitzsch, which are mainly urban, is usually personal credit. Although they occasionally grant loans on mortgage for long periods, they generally confine themselves to the making of loans for comparatively short periods (in the Raiffeisen banks usually for one year, with a maximum of three or five years; in the Schulze-Delitzsch banks, three or six months) on personal security or on the security of personal property.

Loans on mortgage for long periods are, however, granted by another type of cooperative credit society, of which we shall have occasion to speak later, viz, the Landschaften and Ritterschaften. These are associations formed by landowners with the object of obtaining credit for land improvement by the issue of mortgage bonds.

We shall describe in this chapter the organization and working of the Raiffeisen banks.

SECTION 1.—ORGANIZATION OF THE RURAL BANKS.

The fundamental principles of the Raiffeisen system are:
(1) Unlimited liability of the members.
(2) A restricted area of operations.
(3) Gratuitous management.

To these principles, which he wished to be always applied with the utmost rigor and without allowing any exception Herr Raiffeisen added a body of moral and educational doctrines.

In addition to the rural banks which follow strictly the Raiffeisen principles, and are combined in a national federation with headquarters at Neuwied (now removed to Berlin), there have also arisen other organizations which, although adopting the fundamental ideas of Raiffeisen, have not accepted the excessive strictness of his rules and have treated as superfluous the mystical doctrines which he had introduced into cooperation. The societies of this type, after having long hesitated between a separate organization and the Schulze-Delitzsch Federation, were finally collected under the guidance of William Haas, into a separate national federation, which had its headquarters first at Offenbach and then at Darmstadt.

The former of these federations became affiliated to the National Federation in 1904, and to indicate the rapid development of the rural banks we may here state that the number of societies embraced within the National Federation increased from 10,786 in 1904, with a membership of 954,000 and a total business (incoming and outgoings) of 2,490,000,000 marks (a mark is equivalent to 0.238 dollars or 0.0489 pounds sterling), to 12,614 in 1909, with a membership of 1,163,000 and a total business of 4,456,000,000 marks.

Certain differences (not, however, very serious) continue to exist organization of the Raiffeisen banks. The statements are based upon the less strict lines. We shall have occasion to speak of these differences in outlining, as we now proceed to do, the leading features of the organization of the Raiffeisen banks. The statements are based upon the reports of the National Federation and the figures relate (except where the context otherwise indicates) to the year 1909 and to the 12,614 rural banks embraced within the National Federation in that year.

Membership: The members are farmers, usually peasant-proprietors. The 12,614 rural banks existing in 1909 numbered in all 1,163,186 members; that is, an average of 92 members per bank. The number of members per bank varies considerably, however, in different regions, the highest average being in Westphalia, where it reaches 160 members per bank. The minimum number required by the legal constitution of the banks is seven, and some of the recently formed banks have exactly this number of members. The highest number of members contained in any one bank is 1,400, but this is a very exceptional case.

Liability: The principle maintained by Raiffeisen was that of the unlimited joint and several liability of the members. Whilst for other forms of rural cooperation the system of limited liability is increasingly adopted, the system of unlimited liability is still regarded in Germany as the system best adapted to rural cooperative credit. Of the banks existing in Germany 92 per cent are based upon unlimited liability and about 8 per cent upon limited liability. A fractional percentage of the banks were based upon an intermediate system, known as the system of unlimited liability to make supplementary payments.

Shares: Raiffeisen commenced by excluding shares altogether, in order to avoid any danger of capitalistic speculations and, in fact, up to 1876 none of his banks had shares.

Being obliged in that year to comply with the Imperial law which compelled cooperative societies to have foundation capital, he sought to evade the law as far as possible and fixed the shares at a maximum value of 10 marks. The Darmstadt Federation, on the other hand, recommended comparatively large shares but in no case higher than 500 marks. In very few cases, however, does the value of the share exceed 100 marks.

In 1909 the average paid-up capital per member amounted to 19 marks. But in this regard, also, there are great differences as between different regions. The necessity of forming a foundation capital is, in fact, not so great in the case of the exclusively agricultural banks, the operations of which are guaranteed by the lands of the members, as in the case of banks which can only offer a personal guaranty.

Thus in Rhenish Prussia and Hesse, which are mainly industrial, the average paid-up share capital is respectively 103 and 86 marks, while on the other hand, the average is lowest in other regions, such as Westphalia and Oldenburg, where it hardly reaches 4 or 6 marks.

In the societies where the liability is unlimited a member can not take more than one share; in societies with limited liability, however, he may take many. The value of the shares and, in the latter case, also their number, are fixed by the rules. The shares are repayable to the members upon withdrawal from the society, and interest is paid upon them at a rate which must not in any case exceed the interest which borrowers pay upon loans from the society.

Entrance fees: The pure Raiffeisen system does not admit of any entrance fees, as being contrary to the lofty conceptions of mutual responsibility which inspired Raiffeisen's propaganda. Raiffeisen wished that his banks should be open to anyone who required to have recourse to them. The Darmstadt Federation, however, allows small entrance fees, which are immediately carried to the reserve fund.

Area of operations: Another fundamental principle of the Raiffeisen system is that the area of operations should be limited to a commune or a parish. The system of the rural banks is in fact founded on mutual confidence and collective liability; the members must not only know each other personally, but must also be able to see from day to day the manner in which their money is employed.

Management: The organization of the rural banks being, so to speak, familiar and friendly, their management is very simple. The administrative functions are divided between the committee of management, the council of supervision, and the general meeting. The executive work is carried out by the treasurer, who is often the only employee of the bank, and in any case is responsible for the work of the other employees.

The general meeting appoints the committee of management, the council of supervision, and the treasurer. The conduct of the business is intrusted to the committee of management, upon which often sit the best educated persons of the district, such as the schoolmasters or priests; for these, however, actual farmers are being more and more substituted.

The committee of management usually give their services gratuitously. This, too, is one of the principles of the new Raiffeisenism, which, however, permits in any case the remuneration of the treasurer. The Darmstadt Federation also allows the committeemen to be paid for their services when the business of the bank is fairly large.

In 1909 the expenses of management amounted on the average to the modest sum of 638 marks per bank. Here, too, one finds marked differences between the various federations. In Ermland, in east Prussia, and in west Prussia the average expenses of management are rather high, ranging from 1,200 to 1,400 marks. The lowest average is found in the Upper Palatinate, where it is 244 marks. If, again, we consider the general expenses in proportion to the total business done (i. e., the sum of the incomings and outgoings), we find an average percentage of 0.18, with a maximum of 0.53 per cent in the Nassau Federation (Frankfort on the Main) and a minimum of 0.04 per cent in Schleswig-Holstein.

SECTION 2.—THE BUSINESS OF THE RURAL BANKS.

Let us now examine first the sources from which the rural banks draw their working capital and then the methods of advancing the capital so obtained to their own members. We shall thus follow the complete cycle according to which the business of the rural banks is conducted.

Working capital: The capital which the banks have at their disposal for making loans to their members is composed of the shares paid up by the members, the reserve fund accumulated in previous years, the savings deposits and deposits on current account, and, lastly, the sums which the bank procures by means of loans from central cooperative banks, other banks, or private individuals.

In the balance sheet the working capital is approximately the same as the total liabilities. It is true that in the total liabilities are also included items, such as bills issued, which appear in equal amounts on both sides of the balance sheet, and figures relating to certain operations (e. g., property deposited, payments, etc.) which are not part of the capital at the disposal of the bank. However, not being able to eliminate such items, and taking into consideration that they are comparatively unimportant in the case of the rural banks, we can consider the working capital as being roughly equivalent to the total liabilities.

The total liabilities amounted in 1909 for the whole of the German Empire to 1,900,000,000 marks, being an average of 153,000 marks per bank and 1,664 marks per member. These averages varied between rather wide extremes. The average per bank reached almost half a million marks in the Ermland Federation, while it was as low as 67,000 marks in the Grand Duchy of Baden. The average per member was highest in Rhenish Prussia (the Bohn Federation), where it reached 3,000 marks, and lowest in the Grand Duchy of Baden, where is was 700 marks.

Let us now analyze the total working capital according to the items which compose it.

	Marks.	Percentage of the total.
Share capital	22,358,433	1.2
Reserve	50,981,069	2.6
Deposits on current account	189,077,842	9.8
Savings deposits	1,455,618,456	95.2
Other liabilities	217,487,462	11.2
Total working capital	[1] 1,935,523,262	100.0

[1] $461,089,632, or £94,744,821.

Under the head of "other liabilities" are included, besides other items, the sums which the banks have procured by loans from banks and individual capitalists.

The share capital together with the reserve funds from the banks' own capital; the remainder is capital from outside sources. Following this simpler classification we find that the former amounts to 73,339,502 marks, or 3.8 per cent of the total, and the latter to 1,862,183,760 marks, or 96.2 per cent.

These figures suggest some interesting considerations. We see, first of all, that the rural banks succeed in carrying on an enormous business on the foundation of an extremely slender capital. The current accounts and savings deposits furnish, however, the greater part of the working capital, viz, 85 per cent of the total. As against this the loans from third parties only form a relatively small figure, which demonstrates the capacity of the rural banks to provide, for the most part, by the ordinary means, for their operations without having recourse to too great an extent to loans from outsiders. Out of nearly 2,000,000,000 marks placed at the disposal of the farmers, only 11.2 per cent was furnished by outsiders, while 88.8 per cent was provided by the savings and deposits of the farmers themselves or of the local public.

To the capital of the society we have referred when speaking of the shares; of the reserve fund we shall speak when dealing with the distribution of the profit. We need only remark here that the capital obtained from outside sources is 25 times as large as the societies' own capital (share capital and reserve). This proportion is generally considered too high. There is a tendency, therefore, at present to increase the value of the shares, raising it to 50 or 100 marks, in order to provide the rural banks with a wider margin to cover possible fluctuations in the deposits.

In regard to the deposits it should be noted that savings deposits may be made either by members or by nonmembers, but that deposits on current account can only be made by members. In 1909 the savings deposits averaged 115,000 marks per bank. In the various federations this average reached a maximum of 447,000 marks in the Ermland Federation and was lowest in Federation of Alsace-Lorraine, where it was the 43,000 marks. The averages of the deposits on current account were lower, being 22,905 marks per bank and 247 marks per member. The highest averages were found in the Grand Duchy of Hesse, viz, 84.466 marks per bank and 684 marks per member, and the lowest in the Federation of Posen (No. II) and in the Raiffeisen Federation of Alsace-Lorraine, being respectively 4,398 marks and 4,643 marks per bank and 49 marks and 27 marks per member.

We have said that 11 per cent of the working capital is drawn from outside sources. These include the central cooperative banks, the banking institutions and the private individuals with whom the rural banks contract debts by means of banking operations. Since the development of the central banks, however, the business of this kind with other banks or with private individuals has greatly diminished. It will be more convenient to speak of the business done with the central banks when we are dealing with these latter, but we may here remark that since the working capital of the central banks is formed to a large extent by the funds received from the local rural banks the proportion of the money provided by the farmers themselves to be employed in loans for the benefit of agriculture is really even larger than would appear from the figures previously given.

The granting of loans, etc.—The business of the banks consists for the most part in making advances to members. Surplus money is deposited with the central banks or invested in banking operations with third parties. With regard to the loans to members, we will speak first of their character and then of the security upon which they are made.

The rural banks make loans of two kinds, viz, loans on current account and loans for fixed periods. At the end of 1909 the loans to the members outstanding were thus classified:

	Marks.	Percentage of total.
Loans on current account	425,995,403	28.3
Loans for fixed periods	1,082,446,388	71.7
Total loans outstanding	1,508,441,791	100.0

The loans on current account were therefore about a third of the total loans. In all the banks there is a tendency to extend the practice of giving loans on current account. This is generally the most convenient form of loan for the members, for whom the small rural bank serves as banker just as the great banking institutions do for the merchants and manufacturers of the city. But this form of loan requires a higher economic education in the members and more advanced social conditions.

The members guarantee the fulfillment of their obligations to the bank by finding sureties, by the deposit of valuables (share certificates, etc.), by giving a mortgage or by their mere promise. The finding of sureties is the form of security usually preferred.

The period of the loans varies from six months to two or three years and even more in exceptional cases.

Various other arrangements have been thought out to diminish the risk of the loans granted by the rural banks. Thus, for example, the law relating to cooperative societies lays it down that the general meeting shall fix the maximum limit beyond which loans must not be made to the members, whatever may be their financial position or whatever the security offered.

The principal safeguard, however, for the success of the rural banks lies in their very constitution. The limited area of operations and the nature of rural life make it possible for each member to keep an eye upon the affairs of his fellow-members, in which, moreover, he is directly interested, so that he can easily judge at any moment of their solvency and of the manner in which they are utilizing the money obtained from the bank.

Profits.—The object of the rural banks is to give credit to their members on favorable terms and not to make a commercial profit.

The Raiffeisen system, accordingly, does not admit of any distribution of dividend, all the profits realized being carried to the reserve fund or to the creation of institutions of public utility. The Darmstadt Federation, on the other hand, allows a distribution of dividend on the shares, which, however, must not exceed the maximum rate of interest charged to borrowers.

In 1909 the net profit realized by the rural banks was more than 7,000,000 marks. This is sufficient evidence of the flourishing condition of these institutions. Of this enormous profit only a small fraction was distributed as dividend. In no case, in fact, did the dividends distributed exceed 4 per cent of the paid-up shares, and in many cases no dividends at all were distributed. In this manner the banks are continually strengthening their financial position. This is demonstrated by the steady increase of the reserve funds. In a single year, from 1908 to 1909, the aggregate reserve fund was increased by 7,000,000 marks, while the profits realized at the end of 1908 were about 8,000,000 francs. Thus seven-eights (that is, 87 per cent) of the profits made in that year were carried to the reserve.

SECTION 3.—STATISTICS OF THE RURAL BANKS.

The following statistics will show, better than it can otherwise be indicated, the great development in Germany of the rural banks, which were so modestly initiated in 1862.

We give first a table relating to the number of banks legally established in Germany, as shown by their registration in the Gazette of the Empire.

We now give some figures showing the business done by the 12,614 rural banks embraced in the National Federation in 1909. It should be noted that while the figures in the preceding table are derived from information which the societies are bound by law to publish, the following figures are privately collected by the federations (of which we shall give an account presently), and, more particularly, by the National Federation.

SECTION 4.—THE FEDERATIONS AND CENTRAL INSTITUTIONS OF THE RURAL BANKS.

(We adopt here a distinction which is not in general use in English. The word "federation" will be employed to indicate a central organization of cooperative societies for such purposes as propaganda, education, supervision, and mutual defense. By "central institution" we shall mean a central organization of cooperative societies for business purposes.)

The rural banks felt from the beginning the need of combination amongst themselves for common purposes. The need was twofold. On the one hand, a common organization was required to direct the movement and to give it uniformity; on the other hand, there was need of central institutions which might equalize the need of credit of the individual banks, supplying them with money when required and employing their surplus funds.

For the first of these objects the federations were formed; for the second, the central institutions.

(a) The federations.

The federations of cooperative societies are unions formed for propaganda, education, and mutual defense. They embrace not only rural credit societies, but rural cooperative societies of every kind.

We have already mentioned the existence of two great federations, which embrace the whole Empire within their sphere of operations—the Federation of Agricultural Cooperative Societies, with headquarters at Neuwied, founded by Raiffeisen in 1877, and the National Federation of German Agricultural Cooperative Societies, which was founded in 1883 and has its headquarters at Darmstadt. For a long time these led a separate existence, each propagating its own ideas; sometimes, too, there was hostility between them. Finally in 1905 the Neuwied Federation became affiliated to the National Federation of Darmstadt. There is now, therefore, a single organization, the National Federation of Darmstadt, which embraces a very large majority of the German agricultural cooperative societies. It contained on June 1, 1910, no less than 18,962 cooperative societies, including 78 central cooperative societies, 12,894 cooperative credit societies, 2,077 cooperative distributive societies, 2,028 cooperative dairies, and 1,885 cooperative societies of other kinds.

The National Federation is in reality composed of provincial federations. In fact only five cooperative societies, of which four are central institutions, are directly affiliated to the National Federation, while all the rest are indirectly attached to the National Federation by being affiliated to the respective provincial federations. These are federations which embrace the cooperative societies in a defined portion of the territory of the Empire, and which, although affiliated to the National Federation, enjoy a large degree of autonomy.

Besides the work of instruction, organization, and propaganda they fulfill the very important function of inspection assigned to them by the law of 1889. For this purpose they employ inspectors, who by frequent visits supervise the management and the conduct of the business of the affiliated societies.

To indicate the importance of the provincial federations it is sufficient to say that of the 23,845 rural cooperative societies existing in Germany in 1910 no less than 21,830 (i. e., 92 per cent) were organized in federations. The number of provincial federations affiliated to the National Federation is 41. Besides these there are some independent federations, which embrace a limited number of cooperative societies, and of which the most important is the federation of Wurttemberg, containing 1,383 cooperative societies in 1908.

(b) The central banks.

As we have already indicated, the second method of centralizing rural banks and cooperative societies in general is the formation of central banks. Between these and the federations there is no confusion of functions, but they mutually support one another. The central banks undertake the provision of capital for the rural banks and the utilization of their surplus funds, when they have any, always keeping in touch with the corresponding federation, to which they are usually linked by the fact that the same persons manage the business of both institutions. Further, the central banks, as a rule, only admit cooperative societies which already belong to the federation of their province.

The provincial central banks are cooperative societies with limited liability. The Bank of Darmstadt alone is a company with liability limited by shares, having been founded before the law of 1889 allowed the formation of central cooperative societies composed of other cooperative societies.

In 1910 there were affiliated to the National Federation 36 provincial central banks, of which 35 were distributed throughout the various regions of Germany and one was in the German colony of Southwest Africa.

Speaking broadly, it may be said that the central banks fulfill the same functions for the rural banks which the rural banks fulfill for their members.

As in the case of the rural banks, the working capital is furnished by the share capital, by the deposits of the cooperative societies, and by the sums which they procure by loans from the general central banks, or the Prussian Central Bank (of which we shall speak presently), and from other banks or private bankers. In like manner as we have seen in the case of the separate rural banks, the most important part of the working capital is formed by the deposits of the members. This is clearly shown by the following table, which indicates the working capital of the provincial central banks at the end of 1909:

	Marks.	Percentage of total.
Paid-up capital	21,493,532	8.2
Reserve funds	4,321,500	1.6
Deposits of the members	187,345,775	71.3
Loans from the general central banks and the Prussian Central Bank	19,047,687	7.2
Loans from other banks or from private individuals and liabilities in respect of bills	28,616,979	10.9
Other items	1,990.123	.8
Total	[1]262,815,596	100·0

From these figures we see that of the working capital of the provincial banks 9.8 per cent is formed by the funds of the banks themselves (share-capital and reserve), 71.3 per cent by deposits, and 18.9 per cent by loans contracted with third parties. If we compare these percentages with the corresponding figures for the rural banks, we shall see that the funds of the banks themselves, though representing in both cases only a small proportion of the total available capital, is appreciably higher in the central banks than in the rural banks, while the proportion of the deposits is less and of the loans from third parties greater. Accordingly the central banks, by regulating the rate of interest, endeavor to increase the amount of the members' deposits and thus to lessen the necessity of having recourse to outside sources of capital.

The central banks utilize their working capital in making loans to the cooperative societies, either in the form of advances on current account or of loans for fixed periods. The first kind is by far the most usual, unlike what we have seen in the case of the rural banks. This is explained by the fact that the central banks are dealing with economic organisms which are more developed and therefore better adapted to this more advanced form of credit. At the end of 1909 the provincial central banks had about 182,000,000 marks outstanding on loan, of which 173,000,000 marks (that is, 95 per cent) were loans on current account and 9,000,000 marks (5 per cent) loans for fixed periods. The remainder of the capital was invested in securities or in discounting bills of exchange or deposited with the general central banks or with other banks or private bankers.

Besides the provincial banks of which we have spoken, there are also two general central cooperative banks which, unlike the provincial banks, have a sphere of operations which is not limited to that of a provincial federation, but extends over the whole Empire. These are the Central Agricultural Loan Bank of Germany, with headquarters at Berlin, which was founded by Raiffeisen in 1876 and until recently had its headquarters at Neuwied, and the National Bank for Cooperative Societies, with headquarters at Darmstadt, established in 1902 by the National Federation. Both of these banks are companies with liability limited by shares.

The Darmstadt Bank deals almost exclusively with the 36 provincial central banks. To the Berlin Bank, on the other hand, are affiliated 4,399 rural banks of the pure Raiffeisen type, scattered over the whole of Germany. The loans granted to members amounted, in the case of the Berlin Bank, to 74,600,000 marks (of which 2,000,000 were loans for fixed periods) and in the case of the Darmstadt Bank to about 11,000,000 marks, all being loans on current account.

Having considered cooperative credit as a help for the poor, the wage earner, and the toiler, I come now to probably the most important part of the whole banking system, namely, its possible application to the extension of the farmers' credit.

THE FARMER AND THE BANK.

The force of the foregoing statement, as to the importance of increasing the facilities for extending credit to the great farming classes of this country, the "backbone" of every country, is shown by the fact that 95 per cent of our people live on farms and cultivate nearly 1,000,000,000 acres of land, the valuation of which, with buildings and improvements, is more than $34,000,000,000. The annual product of these farms is $9,000,000,000, about as much as all the resources of all our national banks. In other words, 10 per cent of one year's crop product would pay off the national debt. The capital invested in agriculture exceeds that invested in railroads or manufacturing. The tillers of the soil increase the wealth of the country to the extent of $25,000,000 daily, and yet, as has been pointed out, this greatest of all wealth-producing classes have far less facility for credit, under our existing system, than any other class who have less security. We should adapt our laws to meet this crying demand, for the sake of all our people, and we can do it wisely and effectively in a manner adapted to our own needs and habits. Not that I would adopt wholly any European system, but the following quotation from David Lubin is of value:

HOW TO ADAPT THE EUROPEAN SYSTEMS.

As the official report of the proceedings of the Nashville conference has not yet been issued, I annex to my remarks the following questions and answers. They were brought forth, subsequently to the conference, in discussions I had with United States officials, and contain tentative suggestions for modes of adapting the European rural co-operative credit systems to American needs and conditions. They largely reflect the character and trend of the debates at the Nashville conference.

THE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS. DYNAMIC MONEY.

Q. I wish to know whether the proposed adoption and adaptation of the European cooperative rural credit systems for the American farmer is merely a question of procuring him cheap money?—A. The question before us is not merely one of cheap money; it is a question of money in a dynamic form, in the place of money in a static form. Let me make clear what I mean. Money in a dynamic form is in a position to multiply itself, whereas money in the static form is immobile, dead. For instance, were the great department stores, Wanamaker's, Siegel-Cooper's, Macey's, etc., deprived of the free use of money, money in its dynamic form, and compelled to have recourse to mortgages, as the farmers are compelled to do when they need money, these great business houses would then be forced into bankruptcy within a few months.

Q. Will you please explain why?—A. Because, if money is to be employed to advantage, every dollar should find a constant dynamic use. If only the minor portion of these dollars are thus employed, while the major portion remains idle, consuming interest, the major portion will soon eat up any profit earned on the minor portion. With the ordinary commercial account every dollar may be placed on the active line of engagement, and the dollar not so engaged may be immediately returned to the bank and ceases to pay interest for the time it is not wanted. A mortgage, on the other hand, gives a fixed amount for a fixed period, and this is contrary to the commercial usage which permits the free engagement of every dollar in current business. Again, even if the fixed sum obtained on a mortgage be all actively employed, it may be insufficient; but an additional loan would mean a second mortgage, and then, perhaps, a third mortgage. In fact, were a commercial house compelled to do business on this basis, it would soon wind itself up; it would reduce itself to a reductio ad absurdum, the business would go into bankruptcy.

About 40 years ago the business of the retail merchant and of the manufacturer was largely done on the static plan, but as a dynamic factor must appear at some stage of the transaction, it appeared at that time in the form of the "jobber." The jobber had the dynamic dollar and the manufacturer and the retailer the static dollar, and what was the result? The jobber was master of the situation; he had the manufacturer in one pocket and the retailer in the other. Both were at his mercy.

In the early seventies there was a revolt from this system; the manufacturers tried to reach the retailers direct, and the retailers tried to reach the manufacturers direct. There was a war, a war without quarter, and in the end the jobber was driven out. Mark the effect: When the jobber was supreme, American manufactures consisted largely of paper soled shoes and shoddy clothes. To-day, with the jobber driven out, the retailer in the United States does the largest business in the world. The manufacturer can now sell his goods abroad. The shoes I have on, a pair of American shoes, Hannan's, were bought in London. The hat, a Stetson hat, could be had in Florence or anywhere in Europe, and if the American manufacturer were but a little bit more hungry for trade, his goods would percolate and permeate the markets of the world. Thus, while some 40 years ago American manufactured goods were the poorest in the world at the highest prices, the dynamic dollar within reach of the manufacturer and within reach of the retailer, has rendered American manufactures among the best values in the world.

Q. Would it have any bearing on your argument to explain how it came about that the jobber was done away with?—A. Yes; it does have a bearing. It came about in this way: The retail merchant and the manufacturer resolved that this condition should be changed, and they held to their resolve; they worked for it and they got it. That's all there is to it. And now, in the case of the farmer, the same question and answer will apply. If the farmer is resolved to have dynamic money, and if he is firm in his resolve and works for it, then he will get it.

Q. But what do you really mean by dynamic money and static money?—A. Dynamic dollars can be compared to the gilded balls manipulated by a juggler, who keeps each ball in motion, and as many at a time as he desires, each ball moving according to the character of the unit of impelling power. The static use of money may be compared to the same juggler's balls in the hands of a novice; if he attempts to throw them in the air he may only be able to engage one at a time; the others fall to the ground.

AN OPEN ACCOUNT—WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

Q. What do you mean by all of this?—A. I mean this: An open-account dollar is taken from the bank to-day and may be returned to the bank to-morrow, when no further interest is paid on it beyond that for one day's use. But while the dollar is on hand, even if only for one day, it may be turned over in business three or four times; bills discounted at perhaps 5 per cent for cash payments, not a year, but that very day. If the static dollars only find engagement for one-tenth of their amount, the profit earned on the one-tenth is more than consumed by the nine-tenths disengaged, which can not be returned to the bank, but remain idle, consuming interest, until the term of the mortgage expires. Thus we find that in the former case the dollar works free; it is dynamic. In the latter case it is dead; it is static.

Q. Yes; I see. And now that I understand the difference between what you call the dynamic dollar and the static dollar, will you please explain how it is proposed to obtain for the farmers the benefit of the dynamic dollar? What is the plan?—A. Well, it would be presumptuous at this time to give the final or ultimate plan. Before that can be done, and done authoritatively, the proposed committee from each State of the Union would have to go to the European countries, draw up its report on the European systems, and show how they may be adapted in the United States to meet the needs of the American farmer, and all this would have to be crystallized into a plan, and then you would have the answer to your question. At the present time the question may, however, be answered tentatively, and this I will try to do.

THE GERMAN SYSTEMS.

It is proposed to render the American farmer's dollar dynamic by adopting the modes that are in operation in European countries. Toward this end there are the three cooperative rural credit systems in operation in Germany. First, the Raiffeisen system, which (as shown by the official statements published by the International Institute of Agriculture) did a total business for 1909 of over $1,500,000,000. (See p. 21 of "An Outline of the European Cooperative Credit System," published by the International Institute of Agriculture.) Second, the Schulze-Delitzsch system, which did a total business for 1910 of over $3,000,000,000. (See p. 27, op. cit.) Thirdly, under the Landschaften system, bonds were out in 1909 for $840,980,126 (see p. 30, cit.), and thus we have a total business of some $5,000,000,000 a year, and this for Germany alone. What it amounts to for the whole of Europe I do not know, but taking all of the systems in operation there, it certainly represents a volume of business great enough to command the attention and respect of all thinking people.

Q. In what way have the European farmers dynamic money?—A. Under the Landschaften system the plan is substantially the same as that followed by the American merger, the American corporation, the American trust. A group of farmers practically unite into a corporation. They merge their lands, upon which they issue a negotiable bond, a bond rendered so liquid by reason of its being an ample and safe security that money in the open market, in the bourse, can be obtained on it at almost as low a rate of interest as on Government bonds. This money is handled by the board of managers of the Landschaft Association, which may deal with it first of all with reference to the requirements of the individual member of the association, and, secondly, in its federal capacity as a corporation or cooperation. The method of procedure, in short, is much the same as if the board of directors of the United Cigar Stores Co. (with its stores in nearly every city of the United States) were to freely allow its individual cigar stores the money they required and were, at the same time, to employ whatever funds were necessary from its treasury in collective purchase and sale, and in conducting its business collectively. And this is substantially the usual mode of procedure of the American merger, the American corporation, the American trust.

A REMEDY FOR THE TRUST.

Q. Would not a cheaper rate of interest to the farmer bring about all that is asked for?—A. Not under the static plan of mortgage, for that would still leave the unemployed dollar weighting down the employed dollar. Besides, cheap money in itself, whether dynamic or static, is no complete remedy for the American farmer, or for any farmer.

If the farmer has no dynamic money, if he has not got it cooperatively, if there be no collective action with dynamic money, then there arises, as we have previously shown was the case in commerce, the "jobber," who, in this instance, is the trust, and the trust manages this business for the farmer, and manages it for him viciously. The great number of corporations in the United States formed for this purpose, the great number of trusts in farm products, are practically and substantially unknown in Europe. There is no room for them there; the farmer, through the free use of dynamic money, cooperatively and collectively handled, himself performs the functions of the trust. But, in the United States, when this dynamic money, this corporate power, the trust, performs this function, it grasps with one hand the throat of agriculture and with the other the throat of the consumer and says, "You are both my property, and I will manipulate either or both of you as I please." In fact, it takes the same position in agriculture that was formerly occupied in commerce by the jobber.

The adoption of the European systems of rural cooperative credit in a form modified to meet the needs of the American farmers would do away with this corporate power, with the trust, with this throttler of the farmer on the one hand and of the consumer on the other. The various other substitutes and remedies heretofore proposed to lessen the reach of the trust in farm products are all mere palliatives; they sound well to the ear, and that is all. Fight a trust as you will, but, like a cat, it will always land on its feet; the trust will always come out "right side up with care." There is no such thing as fighting an opportunity when that opportunity affords large profits—in fact, any profits. The way to fight a trust effectively is to take away the goods that the trust deals in. Place the American farmer on the same footing that the European farmer is placed through his cooperative associations, through his rural banking system, through the collective use of dynamic money, and the trust as such is killed, or if any semblance of the trust would then be left, the American farmer would play the rôle, and in this play there would be opportunity for the American people to get that measure of equity in exchange which they should have. But if the farmer, on the one hand, continues as he is, unorganized and with static money, and the corporate trusts in farm products with dynamic money, continue, on the other, to perfect their modes and methods and to grow, it will then only be a matter of time when the life will be crushed out of this Republic, because the farmer in a republic—in fact, under any form of government—is the conservative. He holds back and in check the progressive urban, the organized financial and commercial wings on the one hand, and organized labor on the other. Both these forces are of the city; the conservative alone is of the country. The farmer, by holding both of these progressive radical elements in check, makes for stable government. That which destroys the farmer, the conservative, destroys the body politic, destroys the Union, destroys the Republic, destroys any Nation.

Q. How did it happen that the European farmer was so much brighter, that he put the methods you speak of into operation while the American farmer labors under the difficulties you state?—A. It is my belief that the European farmer is no brighter than the American farmer; if anything, he is, perhaps, not quite so bright. The struggle for subsistence, the great cost of government, and the precarious tenure of high place and exalted position in Europe is such that it set the keenest minds at work to solve this problem; it compelled its settlement. The pressure was strongest in Europe, hence the problem was solved there first. The pressure now exerted on the American farmer by the trusts can be met and overcome in the United States by activity similar to that displayed in Europe.

Q. Have you any scheme or plan to suggest for the adaptation of the European systems you speak of to meet the needs of the American farmer?—A. No; for, as already stated, the ultimate plan may only be set forth authoritatively when the proposed committee from the several States in the Union has visited Europe, noted down what it has seen, and formulated its conclusions, and thus brought the matter before the American people. Then only may a plan be authoritatively put forth. At this time I can only propose some possible or tentative phases of plans which occur to my mind.

Q. Please state them.

NATIONAL BANKS: WHY NOT AGRICULTURAL NATIONAL BANKS?

A. One plan would be for the incorporation or cooperative association of groups of farmers, when they could devise and offer as security for the money they require a negotiable bond on their collective assets, a bond at a valuation and of a character which should make it acceptable in the world of commerce and in so liquid a form as to require no lawsuit for foreclosure. This bond could then be offered in the open market, in the bourse, and the funds for the cooperative banking be thus obtained. These funds could then be employed, first, for the use of the individual members of the cooperation, and, second, for the collective use of the cooperation as a whole in swinging its product to market—in its distribution. In all this the American farmer would largely follow along the lines of the German Landschaften system.

A modification of that plan might be had by the formation of rural national banks on the order of the existing national banks. As is known, the American national banks, by depositing as security Government bonds with the United States Treasury, receive from the Government money in the form of national-bank notes, the bond owners continuing to receive from the Government the interest due on the bonds thus deposited. Now, let the cooperative groups of farmers call on Government bond owners to transfer their bonds to these farmers' groups. Let the farmers pay the bond owners, say, 1 per cent per annum for the privilege of this transfer. Let them deposit these transferred Government bonds, along with their own negotiable land bonds, in the United States Treasury, where they would be held in trust for both parties by the United States. On the security of these Government bonds the United States could issue national rural bank notes to these cooperative groups of farmers just as it does in the case of national banks. The United States bond owner would then receive interest on his coupons plus the 1 per cent per annum extra from the farmers' cooperative groups. These groups would thus have money at 1 per cent per annum, and the Government bond owner would have as security a negotiable bond on the collective property of the farmers' cooperation, security which would exceed in value the United States bonds deposited in the Treasury. In substance, the negotiable bond for this property and the Government bonds would both be held in trust by the United States Government, which would simply act as umpire between the bond owners and the farmers, and thus this transaction would be free from any phase of so-called socialism.

Q. What security would the farmers give the United States bond owners?—A. The cooperative farmers' groups would give as security a negotiable bond on their syndicated farm lands. This property would have to be so justly taken up that its value would be unquestioned, and the transfer of Government bonds would then be made for a sum equal to a fraction of the valuation, say, 10 or 20 per cent. This security would then not only be of the highest value, but, if the bonds were made out so that foreclosure could be had without recourse to a lawsuit, the security would be rendered liquid, and the land bonds could then be freely sold in the open market anywhere, and sold for much more than their face value.

Here is a block of land; let us say the farmer values this block of land at $2,000,000; other estimates reduce that value to $1,000,000. On this million dollars the farmers' cooperative group desires $100,000 of Government bonds to be deposited. It calls on the bond owners; one has 10 United States bonds, another 20, another 50, another 100, etc. "Where have you got these bonds?" "Mine are at home in the bureau." "Mine are with the safe deposit company." "Mine are in the cellar." "Give me your bonds and I will put them in Uncle Sam's Treasury, and Uncle Sam can put his hands on them." Uncle Sam would simply be the umpire. The negotiable land bond and the United States bonds would be returned to their respective owners when the time for which the transfer was made expired. If, during that time, the farmers' cooperative group had failed, the land bond, in whole or in part, would be placed on the open market and sold to satisfy the claim, and the United States bond owner would be made good and his bonds returned to him.

HOW THE POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITS COULD BE USED.

Q. If I remember correctly, when this subject was mentioned the other day, you spoke of using the postal savings banks in connection with this scheme. Explain your idea in regard to that.—A. Well, I mentioned the postal savings-bank system, because by using that source of money the urban savings of one portion of the country could be applied to the agricultural needs of another portion. And the money would be applied direct from the depositor to the farmers' groups without the intervention of a bank. This would eliminate the toll, profits, and conditions of the bank. The farmers' cooperative groups would thus obtain their money, through the United States Government, direct from the savings depositors—that is to say, they would obtain it from the original source from which the primary money markets obtain their supply. They would have the advantage of getting this money at the very lowest rate of interest, first, because the postal savings bank, as a Government institution, offering Government security, readily obtains deposits at 2 per cent per annum; and, secondly, because the security which the farmers' cooperative groups could offer—the negotiable bond on their syndicated farm lands, valued on a conservative basis, and offered at a fraction of its value, and under the supervision of the United States Government, would be an unquestioned gilt-edged security.

With a desire to investigate on this line, I went over this matter with some of the post-office savings-bank authorities at Washington. Upon inquiry as to the use to be made of the savings deposits, I was informed that it is proposed to loan them to banks on the security of municipal and other public bonds. I consider such a step as hazardous and likely to lead to disastrous results. A bond may have a comma in the wrong place or a verb misplaced and lead to a lawsuit. Another bond may be repudiated; in the case of a third one the enterprise may sink. Nor are the banks themselves any safer. A certain boat may be beautiful and useful in calm weather, but unable to ride a storm. It may be quite safe for the United States to deposit these savings in banks secured by municipal and other public bonds in times when there is no trouble, but in time of financial stress it might lead to great and disproportionate harm. The United States should not go into business. The Federal power should be simply policeman, umpire, not a corporation for business.

Let us see if a solution may not be found in the following: The postal savings act provides that—

Any depositor in a postal savings depository may surrender his deposit, or any part thereof * * * and receive * * * the amount of the surrendered deposits in United States coupon or registered bonds * * * which bonds shall bear interest at the rate of 2½ per cent per annum * * * and be * * * payable 20 years from the date of their issue.

Now, then, let the United States Government, on every $10 paid into the postal savings bank, give to the depositor, on request, a $10 2½ per cent interest-bearing bond, in accordance with the above provision of the law. Let the farmers, through the United States Government, call on these postal bondholders for a transference of their bonds to the farmers' cooperative groups, agreeing to pay the bond owners, through the Government, an extra one-half per cent interest per annum for such transfer. Upon transfer let these postal bonds be deposited in the United States Treasury, and with them, as security for the fulfillment of the conditions of the transfer, let there be deposited the negotiable bond issued by the farmers' cooperative group on its syndicated lands.

To illustrate: The farmers' cooperative group deposits with the United States Treasury a negotiable bond on its block of land, estimated, under final and ultimate valuation, at, say, $1,000,000. The United States would place that negotiable bond, that security, in its vault. On the strength of that security the farmers' cooperative group calls in, through the Government, say, $200,000 worth of United States postal bonds. On this sum the group agrees to pay through the Government, first, the 2½ per cent interest on the postal bonds plus an additional interest of, say, one-half per cent for the transfer of these bonds to the farmers' group. As the million dollar negotiable land bond is deposited with the United States Government, so is also deposited with it the $200,000 worth of postal bonds, the Government acting as trustee for both the farmer and the postal bond owner. The farmers' cooperative group would then receive from the United States the $200,000 in cash, which the United States postal bond owners originally deposited in the postal savings bank.

The postal bond owner would thus be secured, and more than secured, for the lands of the cooperative group, on which the negotiable bond is made out, could, under the terms of the agreement, be foreclosed, in case of failure, without recourse to a lawsuit. This would make the land bond negotiable on the open market for several times the value of the postal bonds.

Q. If I understand your argument, you claim that by this method a sure investment would be obtained for the postal savings bank deposits. The risk of failure of banks in which savings might be deposited and the risk of a decline in the securities would be done away with; and also, the grasp of the great trusts and corporations on the throats of the farmers would be removed; in fact, the problem of doing away with the trusts in farm products would be solved. Well, now, that is not quite clear to me. How, by the adoption of any one of the systems named, would the power of those trusts be restricted and the farmers be relieved from their grasp?

DYNAMIC MONEY AND ITS COLLECTIVE USE.

A. In this way: Assuming the formation of the proposed cooperative groups of farmers, the individual members of such groups could go to their boards of directors and get whatever money they required on open account, according to a rating on the value of their portion of the syndicated assets of the groups. They could thus obtain credit on that basis just as freely as a merchant can get it at a commercial bank through the rating of the mercantile agencies of Dun and Bradstreet. Again, the board of directors of the farmers' cooperative group, acting collectively for the cooperation as a whole, could employ a portion of this capital to guard and direct the products of the group, its storage warehouses, its elevators, its charges for carriage, its holding of the crop, its distribution of the same; and this would entirely eliminate the rôle of the trusts in farm products. The trusts would then have no goods of the kind to handle. The farmer, with dynamic money and collective energy, would handle this end of the business himself, leaving no more room for the trusts in farm products in the United States than there is for them in Europe.

Q. Would this not be merely a substitution of trusts? In what way would the ordinary consumer be benefited? Would he be benefited in any way?—A. Yes; the law of competition, now rendered largely inoperative by the trusts, would then again be operative. The competition between the various cooperative farmers' groups and the competition of the outside world would soon level prices. While the farmer would get a higher price than he now receives, he would, through the competition spoken of, be compelled to sell to the consumer at a lower price than is current to-day. Say the farmer to-day sells an article to the trust in farm products for 5 cents, which, through the trust, reaches the consumer for 15 cents. The farmer under the proposed system of cooperation and dynamic money would receive, say, 7 cents, and the article reach the final consumer for 12 cents. Thus there would be increased earnings for the farmer and decreased prices for the consumer. It would do for this branch of industry what was done for commerce by the elimination of the jobber between the manufacturer and the retailer, for the mischief formerly done by the jobber is now done by the trust, only in an intensified form.

Q. Let me ask if the matter you have just presented is one that the farmer feels the need of; is he clamoring for it?—A. I see that Mr. G. Grosvenor Dawe, managing director of the Southern Commercial Congress, is present. I would suggest that you ask him to answer that question.

Q. Well, Mr. Dawe, I shall be very glad to hear from you.

Agriculture Appropriation Bill.

OF

HON. THERON AKIN,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 11, 1913,

On the bill (H. R. 28283) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, by all means let us have a daub of the present Secretary of Agriculture, and below it have printed in bold type the following statement from a popular monthly magazine, which, by reading, you will see is a eulogy by the Meat Trust:

Three months after the willful-breaking-of-car-seals announcement the American Meat Packers' Association held its convention in Washington, with Secretary Wilson as a guest of honor at the annual banquet. The packers' official organ, the National Provisioner, gives in the issue of January 20, 1912, the following report of the introduction of Secretary Wilson by the secretary of the association:

"Besides the things that I have already called to your attention, I just want to say one more word personally, and that is that there is not a more lovable man in the whole United States, one who is more appreciated, one who will make you feel prouder that you are an American citizen, than the next speaker, and I consider it a great honor that I am able to introduce to you the honorable the Secretary of Agriculture." [Great applause.]

And Secretary Wilson is reported as responding:

* * * I am pleased to meet you gentlemen for another reason. We have no trouble in executing the meat law. [Applause.] We have had some little remnants of trouble in executing the pure-food law. [Laughter.] But every man connected with the slaughtering of animals, the shipping of their meats, the preparation of food products from meats, is a reasonable man and a gentleman. [Applause.]

This touching interchange of compliments must have been sweet to Secretary Wilson and the packers. But in this matter of Federal meat inspection one fact seems to have been overlooked; that there are three parties—the packers, the Department of Agriculture, and the people. Will the incoming administration and the new Congress be willing and able to assert the rights of the American people? Will they achieve a meat inspection which does inspect, a meat inspection which does protect the health and lives of the people who authorize it, and pay for it, and whose trust in their Government has been betrayed?

The painting of portraits at Government expense has about run its race. Most of those heretofore purchased are daubs and better fitted for illustrating the good or bad qualities of Perry Davis's Pain Killer or Pink Pills for Pale People than to be hung on the walls of public buildings as examples of art and to commemorate the existence of some one who never earned his salary. Too often a Sargent or other notable artist is given an order to paint the features of a nobody, while the man who really did things and deserves well of history is compelled to have his features handed down to posterity by a chromo builder.

The walls of our public buildings in Washington are covered with portraits of Cabinet officers, bureau chiefs, naval and military officials, but a far greater number of these portraits are consigned to the junk pile, the dark, dust-strewn closet, or the unfrequented cellar basements—and all representing money taken from the taxpayer. Many of the officials were on duty for a short time, and aside from signing official documents did nothing to deserve mention even in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the good Lord knows that the man who can not have his name appear in this valuable journal and bunk purveyor is certainly lost to fame or fortune.

Now and then we have men in public office who approach the magnitude of statesmanship and deserve well, both of their countrymen and history. Their lives and deeds are shining beacons along the pathway of time, shedding light for the footsteps of ambitious youths who have before them a career worth following. A Washington, a Jefferson, a Lincoln, a Francis Willard, each have performed a part of life's work in so creditable a manner that it is fitting for man and country to revere their memory and perpetuate their faces and forms in marble or bronze or on canvas. Money for such a purpose is not spent in vain. But when Congress wastes a hundred thousand dollars' worth of time in debating whether a thousand dollars shall be expended upon the portrait of some one whose only claim to fame is the fact that he drew a salary for 16 years by holding a particular office for that length of time, patience ceases to be a virtue, and it is time for Diogenes to appear.

Better, by far, levy upon the black pages of history or pluck from the ignominious ranks of the present a Belknap, a Boss Hessing, a Jake Reem, or a Ballinger, Elder McCabe, Melvin, Steedom, Willie Let-me-alone Moore, or a Maj. Ray, the pet paymaster of the Army.

We have been manufacturing United States Senators at a rapid rate lately—almost as fast as we have been authorizing statuary in public parks—and they are much more deserving of a canvas or a marble bust than dozens of fellows who have received this distinction, and whose existence has passed from the minds of men and whose portraits are now beyond the reach of even a dark lantern. Look at Statuary Hall, filled as it is with the work of freak art. No wonder the late Tim Campbell, of New York, was nonplussed when, in answer to a constituent, who, pointing to the statue of Fulton holding in his hands a model of a side-wheel steamboat, asked the name of the man this commemorated in marble, said, "Oh—I forget. Yes; now I remember, he was the inventor of the roller skate."

In Statuary Hall we find a little good but too much bad, but as the various States are responsible for what is presented, perhaps criticism from Congress is out of place. But in all cases like the one before us for consideration we, as guardians of the people's strong box, should see to it that what we do will meet with the approval of those who pay the bills. We have not had many Secretaries of Agriculture, but of the number thus far credited to that department, only one has done anything which deserves a place in history, and he is entitled to several volumes, and his statue, in finest marble by the most renowned sculptor, should have a place on the Agricultural Grounds, in front of the new building. He not only was economical in his management of that department, but he was in reality Secretary of Agriculture. He was not the simple tool of his solicitor or chief clerk. He was not compelled to play second fiddle to any of his employees. He did not sell favors and patronage to Members of Congress and help promote fake irrigation schemes in Colorado and ride in private cars of receivers of the defunct Standley Lake Dam project. He did not permit his employees to lobby before Congress for special favors, nor did he ask favors for himself. He did not expect or request the Government to room and board his family simply because he himself held office, and he did not spend public funds to perpetuate a publicity bureau whose chief aim was to mail daily bulletins, explaining to an ignorant people that he was the greatest Secretary of Agriculture "ever," who furnishes amusement to the onlookers at cross-breeding station of zebras and Missouri mules, who would experiment on the feasibility of feeding cows on boxing gloves to make them produce milk punches, crossing lightning bugs with honey bees so they could work in the nighttime, and milkweeds crossed with egg plants to make a foundation for Burbank custards. He had great respect for the office he held, and he insisted that each employee should earn his salary. He also assumed all the responsibilities of his office and he had sufficient gray matter in his bone box to fit him for every task, no matter how difficult, and he never thought of being a clerk to his employees.

He knew how to say "no" even to Senators and Congressmen, and he never helped the politicians pay debts with Government funds. He was not always popular, for he insisted on defending the Government against all attacks, and he never hinted to one of his favorites that he would be pleased if Congress would appropriate $1,000 for a portrait. His fame is secure. He will live in the memory of posterity long after portrait-hunting secretaries have been interred in the political cemetery. Congress may refuse him a statue, a canvas, or honorable mention, but the statutes of every State in this Union, the boys and girls in every town and hamlet of the Republic, and the trees to be planted by the millions yet unborn all acclaim and keep alive the name of the founder of Arbor Day—J. Sterling Morton.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. KENNETH D. McKELLAR,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 23, 1913,

On House resolution 864, paying tribute to the memory of Hon. ROBERT L. TAYLOR, late a Senator from the State of Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, Senator ROBERT L. TAYLOR was, next to the three Presidents that Tennessee has furnished to the Union, the best-known man to the Republic at large that Tennessee has ever produced.

Andrew Jackson, of course, was famous in war long before he was President. If he had done nothing else but defeat the British at New Orleans his fame would have been secure. He did not lessen that fame, but increased it when he became President. In like manner James K. Polk, while not a soldier, yet he was President of the United States at a time of a great war, the results of which added great territory to this country and brought great fame to him. Andrew Johnson became President at a time when the public mind was so inflamed with internecine strife that he did not and could not do himself justice, nor could the country do him justice, yet perhaps no President was ever more talked about by all the people than Andrew Johnson. All of these three great men made their reputations out of war.

BOB TAYLOR, on the other hand, who, in my judgment, as I have said, was the best-known Tennesseean next to the Tennessee Presidents, was a man of peace and won his renown, not in strife on the field of battle or amidst war's dreadful alarms, but in an earnest and unceasing effort to make men and women and children happier, more contented, more peaceful, and equip them better to bear the burdens of life.

I first met Senator TAYLOR in the campaign of 1896. He had then already been governor of Tennessee twice and had retired from office several years before. He did not want to be nominated for governor again. His ambition had been for many years to go to the Senate, but that year Tennessee was close, and the so-called "gold" element in the party in Tennessee was strong, and the party leaders knew that unless they put up a man who was particularly acceptable to the people a Republican would be elected. By the use of this argument Gov. TAYLOR was induced to accept the gubernatorial nomination. He made a characteristic campaign and won by a considerable majority. From the first time I ever met him and heard him speak I became his friend, and that friendship continued until his death.

It was in that same campaign that E. W. Carmack ran for Congress in the district I now have the honor to represent, and made the remarkable campaign against Col. Josiah Patterson, which made Carmack famous. He and Gov. TAYLOR held similar political views and both were elected. TAYLOR was governor when Senator Harris died, and at Carmack's solicitation Gov. TAYLOR appointed Thomas B. Turley, of Memphis, to succeed Senator Harris. When the legislature met in 1899 there was a three-cornered fight for the senatorial vacancy, the three candidates being Turley, McMillin, and TAYLOR. The race was between Turley and McMillin, but about eight men continuously voted for TAYLOR who held the balance of power. Finally Gov. TAYLOR turned his men to Turley and Turley was elected. When Turley's time expired he declined to run again and Carmack became a candidate to succeed him, and was elected. Gov. TAYLOR did not become a candidate then, but did undertake to succeed Gen. Bate in 1902. Carmack declared for Bate, and Bate was elected, only to die a few days after his term of office began. The legislature was in session and Gov. TAYLOR, Gov. McMillin, and Gov. Frazier all became candidates. Frazier was elected, and Gov. TAYLOR and his friends and Gov. McMillin and his friends said it was through Carmack's influence. Accordingly Gov. TAYLOR announced for the Senate against Carmack in 1906, and after one of the most strenuous campaigns ever witnessed in Tennessee TAYLOR was elected by a small majority and held the office until his death.

As is natural in such cases there was some bitterness engendered between Senator TAYLOR and Senator Carmack in this fight, but it soon died away, and the last time I saw them together before Carmack's death they were calling each other "Ned" and "Bob," and telling the best assortment of stories I ever listened to, they both having this gift to a remarkable degree.

Senator TAYLOR was an exceedingly modest man, and while one of the best talkers before an audience our country ever produced, and while anyone would think from listening at him that he was the most self-possessed talker in the world, yet there were times when he virtually took "stage fright." I recall an incident of this kind that took place at the Democratic national convention at Denver in 1908. It happened I roomed with Senator TAYLOR at that time. I think it was on the second day of the convention we went to the hall together and sat together. The convention managers, under the leadership of OLLIE JAMES, undertook to adjourn the convention at once after it met, but neither the delegates nor the audience would hear to it. When I saw it was not going to adjourn I turned to Senator TAYLOR, and said, "Governor, this is now your time. The convention will call on you." At the mention of it Senator TAYLOR turned white and said he had to get out. Cries rose all over the house for "TAYLOR," "TAYLOR," "BOB TAYLOR, of Tennessee"! His name received a tremendous ovation. In the meantime he, in spite of the entreaties of his friends all around him, rushed out of the building and could not be found, and afterwards he told me he never had such a case of stage fright in his life.

The chairman, recognizing the call for Gov. TAYLOR, appointed a committee to escort him to the speaker's stand, but the committee could not find him. In the meantime, failing to get Senator TAYLOR, the convention called for Senator GORE, and that gentleman responded, making the famous speech of his life, which was cheered for 1 hour and 32 minutes. Gov. TAYLOR was afterwards called on again, and did address the convention, making a masterly and delightful speech, but the psychological moment had gone, and he did not have the same opportunity for making a national reputation he would have had if he had not taken stage fright in the first instance.

ROBERT L. TAYLOR was a most remarkable man. Born a gentleman, he knew no class distinction. He was equally at home in the mansions of the rich and in the cottages of the poor. He was equally gracious to people in whatever walk in life he found them. He numbered among his friends both nabobs of place and power and the the mendicants and ne'er-do-wells who accepted his bounty. He was equally at home on the yacht of the President or on the vast estates of his millionaire friends, whom he frequently visited, or in the humble homes of the poorest in the land, and equally deferential and considerate to all. He was adored by the church people of whatever denomination, for he was a devout Christian gentleman, and at the same time he was the patron saint of the ungodly and the sinners.

He was the prince of entertainers, whether on the lecture platform or in private conversation. I never heard him lecture or make a speech but when he had finished he was wildly called upon by the audience to go on. I never heard him tell a story in private conversation but when he was asked to tell another when that one was finished. This was true even on one occasion when he was telling a story to the President of the United States, and the President demanded and received another. He loved nothing better than to get into a crowd of his friends and tell these stories, and his friends loved nothing better than to hear them. I once heard him and Carmack and Private John Allen, of Mississippi, together in a story-telling contest, and it was a rare treat; but the other two, as good as they were, were distanced by Gov. TAYLOR. His reverence for women was very marked, and in his lectures and speeches he always referred to them. As a son, as a brother, as a husband and father, he was kind and gentle and lovable to a degree. His children were wild in their love and admiration for him. His brothers looked up to him and saw him the paragon of all virtues. And his sweet and beautiful wife found in him all that was adorable. His friends never saw his faults, his acquaintances overlooked them, and whatever enemies he had soon forgave them. He was charitable to a degree.

In the early part of his life he was not a money maker, but after he went on the lecture platform he became one of the best of money-makers and laid up a considerable store, only to lose it all and more in an unfortunate magazine enterprise, and then he had to go on the platform again to lecture to pay out of debt. But he never lost faith in himself or in others. He never grew despondent, but was always an optimist. When others imposed on him, he forgave them. He did not find fault. When he was in Congress, when he was governor, when he was Senator, he was constantly doing favors for others. Probably no man in public life in Tennessee was ever called upon oftener for political and other favors, and probably no man ever responded more generously, or tried to secure favors for others so earnestly and vigorously. And many of those for whom he secured favors turned their backs on him afterwards when he wanted one; but even of this he did not complain. On the contrary, he tried to find an excuse for their ingratitude. His faith in his kind was beautiful to a degree. His deep and abiding love for all humanity was the moving spirit in his life.

For the greater period of his manhood he was an officeholder. And yet no one ever thought of him in the ordinary sense in which people look upon long officeholding. Never a breath of scandal or even suspicion attached itself to any of his public or private acts. Without parading it, he had a contempt for all shady or crooked transactions. He was a Congressman, and made a most excellent Representative. He was governor three times, and all that his enemies found to criticize was his use of the pardoning power. He did use this freely, and was right in so doing. The people of his State always upheld him in it, and the fight made on him about it was his tower of strength in many a political campaign. He simply did what he believed to be right, and his pardons were free to rich and poor alike whom he deemed worthy of them. No hint or suggestion of scandal was ever heard as to a single one of them. His political life as well as his private life was as an open book.

The rest of his family were Republicans. His brother, the Hon. A. A. Taylor, being a notable one, who ran against BOB TAYLOR for governor in 1886. However, Gov. TAYLOR was a true and genuine Democrat in every impulse of his nature. He was democratic in his private life and habits. He was democratic in his mental methods. He was democratic in his religion and in his every belief. His devotion to his party was his cardinal principle of action. He was never a leader in working out Democratic policies. But he was always a party worker after those policies had been outlined. Nothing so pleased him as when his party was in accord in its policies. Nothing so distressed or disturbed him as when his party was in discord on policies. I shall never forget his trials and tribulations over the unhappy factional differences that existed in the Tennessee Democracy for several years prior to his death, and which unhappily still exist. He did all that mortal man could do to adjust them, even to becoming a candidate for governor in 1910, while he still had two more years to serve as Senator. Of course, this was a sacrifice that he did not want to make, for there was never a Senator of the United States who enjoyed the place more than Senator TAYLOR, yet he strove to be elected with all the zeal of a man who considered it the great goal of his every ambition. Indeed, Senator TAYLOR did so consider it, for he would have considered it the proudest honor of all that ever came to him, and many honors came to him from the people of Tennessee, if he could have redeemed Tennessee from Republican rule and brought back peace and harmony to his distracted party. His campaign in 1910 was a wonderful one considering the great odds against him, and if he had had two weeks more in which to let the people see the situation he would have won.

His patriotism was of the highest type. He was born under the old régime of slavery in the South. His parents were slaveholders, and he was a boy when the war began. He was personally familiar with all the horrible trials of the reconstruction period. But these never embittered him. He, as all farseeing men have done in the South, took the broader view that all this was the necessary result of war and defeat, and always believed that the storm would be safely weathered, as it has, and that our beloved country would be but the greater and better for the awful experience. He was always a staunch defender of the South and her people, but without bitterness toward our northern friends. He believed, and gloried in the belief, in the greatness of our common country. He revered her past, was proud of her present high place among the nations of the earth, and was absolutely confident of her future. Nothing so delighted him as to grow poetic over her natural beauties and eloquent over the opportunities she offered to her splendid sons and daughters.

Mr. Speaker, what we may say here, after all is said, means but little.

> Can storied urn or animated bust
> Back to its mansions call the fleeting breath?
> Can honor's voice provoke the silent dust,
> Or flattery soothe the dull, cold ear of death?

No, Mr. Speaker, neither monuments nor spires, nor massive domes can bring BOB TAYLOR back to life. Nor can all the eloquent voices of the universe recall that matchless spirit to its worldly abode! All that we who knew him and loved him while he was with us can do or say is to give expression to our love for him when living and to our grief for his departure from us for our own satisfaction. It can do him no good. It only affects us. But, Mr. Speaker, in the hearts of every man, woman, or child who knew him and heard him tell the affecting but simple and beautiful stories of life, who listened to his matchless eloquence, who listened to his heart-reaching pathos, who heard his word painting, who were affected by his simple, quaint, but powerful philosophy in human thought and action, there are already monuments built to the memory of BOB TAYLOR that nothing but death will ever remove!

The Late Representative Utter, of Rhode Island.

OF

HON. ROBERT O. HARRIS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 9, 1913.

On House resolution 824, paying tribute to the memory of Hon. GEORGE H. UTTER, late a Representative from the State of Rhode Island.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to add something to the eulogies of those of his friends who were friends of longer standing and more intimate acquaintance with Gov. UTTER than myself. I had known of him, but had never met him until the day the Sixty-second Congress convened in extra session.

It chanced that his seat was in front of mine, and as we were both new Members, and both from New England States, we readily and easily got acquainted. I used to discuss the questions that came before us with him, and learned to have great respect not only for his judgment but also for his absolute sincerity of mind and uprightness of purpose. He was always kindly and courteous in manner, and was never provoked into showing heat or passion even in sharp discussion.

As he was clean and upright of mind, so was he in all his ways and habits, and the friendship I formed for him was one that was allowed to continue for all too short a time. Although he has passed on, and my contact with him was short, nevertheless in the brief time that I knew him he proved one of those who are not readily forgotten and who in their passing through life leave impressions that are fragrant as flowers, and the memories of whom are like the faded rose leaves in the jar. We may leave them or set them aside for a time, but when the hours of retrospection descend upon us and we lift the lid of the jar that holds our sacred relics, refreshing, grateful, and stimulating comes the sweetness of a clean and honest friendship, which had in it only the things which are born in honor and sustained by virtue.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. THETUS W. SIMS,
OF TENNESSEE,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Sunday, February 23, 1913,

On House resolution 864, paying tribute to the memory of Hon. ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR, late a Senator from the State of Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, there never was but one "BOB TAYLOR," and I fear there will never be another. I never saw another man who was in any way like him. I have seen men who resembled him in some one or more facial features, some who had a voice somewhat like his, but, as a whole, in feature, voice, gesture, expression, and manner he had no counterpart, he had no twin. He can never be even successfully imitated. To see him once was to remember him always. No one ever had to be introduced to him the second time. No one could ever forget him who ever saw him or heard him speak.

Mr. Speaker, I think the greatest service that any of us can render to future generations or to those of the present generation who have not had the good fortune to have come in contact with the beloved deceased Senator is to furnish the best and most accurate description of him in all respects it is possible by mere words to do. I was one of the committee appointed by the House of Representatives to accompany the remains of Senator TAYLOR to his own beloved State for interment at Knoxville. While at Knoxville a funeral oration was delivered by Rev. W. S. Neighbors, D. D., his former pastor, neighbor, and friend, which comes nearer to being a life picture of Senator TAYLOR than any other address I have ever heard. As soon as I returned to Washington, by leave of the House I had that great oration put into the RECORD and sent many thousands of copies to the friends and admirers of the Senator in Tennessee. In order that that oration may be printed and sent out in the bound volumes of these eulogies, I now read the same, as the most fitting tribute to the life, character, and public services of the loved and lamented dead now extant:

"Of the public life of Senator TAYLOR I shall not try to speak except incidentally. I am in no wise furnished for such a duty, and besides the Nation has spoken. Almost every State in the Union has spoken. Every railroad station from Washington to Nashville and back to Knoxville has spoken. Every great daily newspaper has spoken, and most wisely, of Senator TAYLOR'S public career.

"I wish I were fully able to unfold to you the secrets of Senator TAYLOR'S marvelous power over men. When, years ago, I knew him less intimately than when he died, if I had been asked for these wonderful secrets I would have given them without hesitation and perhaps quite dogmatically.

"First of all, I would have said that the secret of his power over men was his unbounded friendship for all sorts and conditions of humanity, reaching its climax in that proverb, 'He who would have friends must show himself friendly.' I still hold to this as a general proposition, but what is friendship? It is not a baseless fabric. It must be founded on something that makes it secure.

"In the second place, I would have, years ago, told you that the secret of this man's power was in the beautiful songs and stories that he sang and told all over his native State—songs and stories that touched every chord in every human heart. But then songs and stories are not in themselves complete. There must be something back of them to give them point and pathos and pungency and power. I might have sung all of his songs and told all of his stories to all of his audiences and yet have won no heart.

"In the third place, I would have said that the secret of his power over men was due to the simple way in which he uttered his thoughts. I still hold to that as a reasonably true proposition, but what is simplicity? It is not shallowness—the mere play upon the surface of things. It is not a natural or a common product, belonging to men in general. Only the greatest men can be simple; only the great men are capable of going to the very heart of things, bringing up the hidden depths and making them transparent.

"Fourth. I made the statement years ago that his power with an audience was due to the fact that his soul was full of music; that in every other human being there are musical chords slumbering in the hidden recesses of their nature, waiting only for the touch of a master hand to respond; and that Senator TAYLOR'S was that master hand. But what made it a master hand? I used to have little enough musical sense to believe that if a score of persons were playing upon the same kind of instruments, all tuned alike and playing the same piece, that there would be the same results; but I very recently learned that that is not true. Some time ago I saw that tested in my own school. A number were playing upon pianos, all tuned alike. The players were playing the same piece, and yet as I walked through the campus I could easily pick out some players from others. Somehow or other there was something within their very souls going into their instruments and bringing forth strains of music that were mellow, full of pathos and sentiment, winning all hearts who heard them that day.

"Senator TAYLOR had that indescribable combination of rare gifts and graces that made him a master before all sorts and conditions of humanity. If I had to state any one thing as the great secret of this great power, I would say it was his great heart, a heart that overflowed all bounds and actuated every movement of his life and made him absolutely invincible before humanity. I have said it before and I say it again; if Senator TAYLOR had moved to any other State in this Union and they had given him his citizenship, in 15 minutes after he arrived he could have run for the highest honor in the gift of that State, and under all reasonable conditions would have won out over any man pitted against him.

"Some have been so ungrateful or unthoughtful as to hint that Senator TAYLOR was not a deep nor a strong man in the affairs of state.

"I am sure that those who knew him best never made such a statement. He was always deep enough to get to the bottom of things, and that is deep enough. He was always strong enough to tear down the fortifications of all of his opponents and carry the day, and that was strong enough.

"I have seen him when whole multitudes came floating into port upon the tears that flowed down his manly cheeks. I have seen him with a mere wave of the hand silence or stir the crowds, just as he willed. I have seen the mere cut or twinkle of his eye change the whole atmosphere of the listening throngs. I have seen the pucker of his lips make his hearers laugh or cry.

"But it is of the humbler things in his life that I wish to speak to-day. He was a complete exception to the old rule, 'A prophet is not without honor save in his own country.' He was most highly honored at home. The people believed in him and followed him. Again and again I have seen him step off of the train at his home town after weeks of absence, and his way was literally blocked by people of all grades and distinctions; even the negroes and the little children followed him. Anxious though he was to get home, the crowds about him often exacted a speech before they would let him go. I have seen his family play a trick on the town people and send a closed carriage to some secret place and notify him to get off on the opposite side, slip to his carriage, and steal away home.

"His relation to negroes was remarkable. In his dealings with them there was that same open and frank and tender interest. With him there was no ax to grind. He simply cared for them, and they responded graciously to his great spirit. In some of his great lectures where he mentioned the names of 'Rastus' and 'Ephraham,' you may have thought those were fancies, but they were the real names of the real negroes that belonged to the Senator's father before the war. In one of his lectures he tells at length the story of Uncle Rufus and how he had come to his home from time to time, and how that one afternoon he stayed with him in his yard and talked of the days before the war, till in memory the boy was again upon the old negro's back, riding along the banks of the beautiful Watauga. But, as he tells it, when the evening shadows were lengthening Uncle Rufus grew serious and said:

"'Bob, my boy, I'se not gwine to be he'ah much longer. I'se already had two visions of the chariot of de Lord, and when it comes de third time I'se a gwine to step in and go home'; and, sure enough, in just a few days after that afternoon the chariot of the Lord descended for the third time and Uncle Rufus went home. He tells you this in one of his lectures, but there is another part of that story his personal modesty would not allow him to tell. I tell it to you to-day. When the old darkey died 'BOB' TAYLOR bought his shroud and casket and chartered a whole train to take the darkies and all of the white people who wished to go back to Happy Valley, the burying ground of the Taylor family. As they put the remains of the old darkey away close beside his master Senator TAYLOR stood at his grave and wept, as on another day he had stood at his father's grave and wept.

"Here is another story setting forth his tender relationship to his father's old darkies: Returning from one of his lecture tours, he said to me, 'I have had the greatest trip of my life this time. Over in Arkansas I found that I had a few days to spare between my lecture engagements and I found that I was within a few miles of some of my father's old darkies who moved away to that State after the war, whom I had not seen for 30 years. I gave De Long Rice, my manager, the dodge and went to spend the time with these old negroes. When I got into the community and told them that I was ''Bob'' TAYLOR, they gathered around me in a circle and looked me in the face and cried out in unison: "Is dat you, Bob?" I said, "Yes; this is Bob." They fell back and laughed. They gathered around me again and more excitedly said: "Is dat you, Bob?" and I said "This is BOB TAYLOR." Then they cried and said: "Bob, we are mighty glad to see you. We haven't seed you since you's a boy back at the old home." One of them said: "Bob, my son Jim's been gone for three years, but if anybody was to ask me which I'd rudder see, BOB TAYLOR or my son Jim, I swear 'fore de Lord I could not tell."'

HIS LIFE IN HIS HOME.

"If you never knew Senator TAYLOR in his home, much of the best and most remarkable in him you never knew. No one set of words can adequately describe him here. He was the liveliest of the lively, the greatest of the great, the saddest of the sad, and the sickest of the sick, according to the conditions that obtained at home.

"If every member of his family was happy and strong he was the jolliest boy there—into every kind of mischief and playing every kind of prank—a perfect child among the children, but if any member of his family was sick, the whole scene was changed. He was the sickest of the sick. I have seen the dear, sensitive soul walk the floor in agony, face all pinched and drawn, over the sufferings of any member of his household. I have seen him again, when the doctor had announced that the patient was out of danger, stir the whole household with laughter almost before the tears of grief were gone from his face.

"Happy Valley, the home of his childhood, and Robins Roost, the home of his later years, were not poetic fancies with him. They were to him the best of all he held sacred and dear. As a statesman he held lofty aspirations, but these things were mere visions and dreams and their attainment only the paradise of fools, as compared to his home. Only a few weeks ago it was my pleasure to spend a day with him in Sullivan County. I was sent for to dedicate a schoolhouse. Senator TAYLOR was sent for to make the occasion a great, good day for those honest sons of toil. He made it. There were no Republicans there that day; whatever they were elsewhere and on other days, they were all blended into a great brotherhood that day. The Senator reached his climax when he urged the boys to stay on the farm, build up good homes, and be true to 'Sallie and the children.'

"To him the church was a very sacred place. It was verily the house of God and never a place for merriment or even light things with him. He was never quite willing to give any of his lectures in a church, though they were as pure as the snow. 'No, no,' he would say, 'Let me speak in a warehouse or a barn or out under the spreading oaks, but not there. That is the house of God.'

"When home from his public duties you could count on him being at church every Sunday and was always reverent and responsive. The hardest time I ever had with him as his pastor was to control him in his gifts to charity. I have held for years that this thing of charity is often a very doubtful proposition; that the only charity worth the name is to help people to help themselves, but Senator TAYLOR's heart frequently got the upper hand of his head and the upper hand of me. His great, tender soul made him so acute to the sufferings of others that it seemed he could hear a little child's cry of want clear across the city, and the murmur of hunger stirred him so completely that he would give all he had and ask no questions. I used to almost wish I could send him away from home at Christmas time. I found that designing people, the professional tramps and beggars, had found out his nature and were preying upon him. He would not stop at buying apples by the barrel for the poor and to make them happy, but would buy whole wagonloads and give them out to all grades and distinctions of human beings, white or black; it made no difference with him.

"Senator TAYLOR had a large religious nature, and the last time I ever talked with him on the subject of religion was here in Knoxville just in front of Church Street Church. He and I had driven over here to hear Bishop Hendrix preach. When we got here a love feast was going on. The doors were closed and locked. A large crowd on the outside was trying to get in. He turned to me and with a pathetic expression on his face said: 'Neighbors, that reminds me of the final judgment, with many getting there too late and finding the door locked. I hope when my little day is done I will not get there too late and somehow through God's infinite mercy He will let me in.'

"A friend of his and mine said to me just a few days ago: 'Senator TAYLOR was in my home recently. My children gathered about him and asked him to sing for them. He sang several little songs that amused them very much, but finally he said, ''Children, I want to sing you one more song.'' He then beautifully and tenderly sang Jesus, Lover of My Soul, Let Me to Thy Bosom Fly.'

"Friends, as I hasten to a close, Senator TAYLOR would not allow me to pronounce him faultless if he could speak. He would say in his own inimitable way, 'Neighbors, you know me. You know I am just a human being, with limitations like other men, full of mistakes and blunders.' But I would be compelled to say, 'Yes; Senator TAYLOR, I know that and I will be true to your wishes; but you must allow me to say another thing upon my own responsibility—this: It was never any part of your program to wrong any human being or harm anything God has ever made. Senator, as I have seen and known you, allow me to say most gently, your great nature was too large to be little and too good to be mean.'

"When Dickens was bringing out Old Curiosity Shop by chapters, the readers appealed to him, 'Do not let little Nell die. It's a life so beautiful,' but Dickens replied, 'I have to let her die. I can't help it. She must die to complete the story and her life work.'

"When Senator TAYLOR was reported seriously ill hearts from all over Tennessee and this Nation went up. 'Oh, God, don't let him die,' but God had to let him die—die to complete his life story—die to bury out of sight all little human defects and blemishes and lift him into that sublimer light and life, where men are blended into such a brotherhood as to remember only what is good and true.

"And this his epitaph shall be,
When ended are his days:
None knew him but to love him.
None named him but to praise."

Interstate Shipment of Liquors.

Acknowledged evils, however grave and urgent they may appear to be, had better be borne than the risk be run in the effort to suppress them, of more serious consequences by resort to expedients of even doubtful constitutionality. (Chief Justice Fuller in Knight's case, 156 U. S., 1.)

SPEECH

OF

HON. CHARLES L. BARTLETT,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 8, 1913.

The House had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17593) to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate-commerce character in certain cases.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I shall not vote for this bill. [Applause.] I shall not vote for it, Mr. Speaker, not because I am not in favor of State sovereignty and not because I have lost any of my devotion and attachment to State rights, but because a man who is in favor of maintaining the State rights under our form of Government must at the same time recognize that under this dual system of government there are some rights of the National Government that are exclusive and which Congress can not surrender to the States. [Applause.] This is one of them, Mr. Speaker. The right to regulate and control interstate commerce, after the great contest in the Constitutional Convention of 1787, was by common consent granted by the States exclusively to this General Government, and I need not but read from a great Chief Justice in an early case to show that the Congress of the United States has no more right to surrender that right to the States than it has the right to surrender the duty of coining money or to make anything else legal tender for debt except gold and silver. Said Chief Justice Taney, in Fifth Howard, United States, page 580:

But it is equally clear that, as to all future laws by the States, if the Constitution deprived them of the power of making any regulations on the subject—

That is, of interstate commerce—

an act of Congress could not restore it. For it will hardly be contended that an act of Congress can alter the Constitution and confer upon a State a power which the Constitution declares it shall not possess.

And if the grant of power to the United States to make regulations of commerce is a prohibition to the States to make any regulation upon the subject, Congress could no more restore to the States the power of which it was thus deprived than it could authorize them to coin money, or make paper money a tender in the payment of debt, or to do any other act forbidden to them by the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I have no apology to make to the gentleman from Tennessee or anybody else that I stand and endeavor to defend the Constitution of the United States. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States from whose decision I have just quoted was both a great judge and an earnest advocate and defender of the rights of the States.

The time may be now when he and others here, in order to gain the high applause of others, may vote to destroy the Constitution, but there will come a time, Mr. Speaker, when those who have been true and loyal to it will be blessed rather than cursed by the people. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Public Buildings.

OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH,
OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 17, 1913,

On the bill (H. R. 28766) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, it is with great reluctance that I rise to oppose the passage of this bill. Indeed, I realize that opposition on my part to this measure will gain me few friends in this House, but I feel that I would not be doing justice to myself, nor to the people that I have the honor to represent, if I did not protest against and oppose the passage of the bill now before this body. For years and years we, on the Democratic side, have charged the Republican Party with gross extravagance; we have promised the American people that we would give them an honest and economical administration; and that we would put an end to the wasting of the people's money.

Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that we should not only preach economy but that we should practice it, and I maintain that it is our duty to keep every pledge and promise that we have made to the American people. The passage of this bill would indicate that we can not and will not keep these pledges. Some Members are under the impression and belief that the securing of appropriations for post-office sites or for the erection of post-offices or some other Government buildings in their districts, will be of great benefit to them, but if they will only look back to the Sixtieth and Sixty-first Congresses and note the large number of Republicans who were then Members of this body and who rested their hopes for reelection on what they had done for their respective districts in the way of securing public buildings, and who went down to defeat, they will surely satisfy themselves that the securing of appropriations for buildings does not materially aid in reelection.

Mr. Speaker, time has not permitted me to compile statistics showing the total amount carried in this bill, but if I am not mistaken it carries nearly $26,000,000, and before the Republican Senate is through with adding its pet measures it will reach close on to $30,000,000. I concede that there are some provisions in this bill that are meritorious and that some of the appropriations provided for are necessary; but, on the other hand, there are many appropriations for post offices in cities of less than 2,000 population. Surely a city with from 2,000 to 3,000 inhabitants, where the receipts of the post office do not exceed $5,000 or $6,000 annually, has no right to expect the Government to expend from $50,000 to $100,000 for a post office. I notice in the bill an appropriation of $75,000 for a post office at Willows, Cal., and on examination I find the population of that city to be 1,139; then, among the other villages provided with post offices we find the following: Andalusia, Ala., $50,000, population 2,480; Russellville, Ark., $50,000, population 2,936; Glenwood Springs, Colo., $100,000, population 2,019; Sandpoint, Idaho, $70,000, population 2,993; Paxton, Ill., $60,000, population 2,912; North Vernon, Ind., $60,000, population 2,915; Vinton, Iowa, $70,000, population 3,336; Glasgow, Ky., $60,000, population 2,316; Marion, Ky., $70,000, population 1,627; Bad Axe, Mich., $55,000, population 1,559; Fairmont, Minn., $65,000, population 2,958; Central City, Nebr., $55,000, population 2,428; Lancaster, S. C., $50,000, population 2,098; Bellefourche, S. Dak., $75,000, population 1,352; Pittsburg, Tex., $55,000, population 1,916; Waynesboro, Va., $52,500, population 1,386; Norton, Va., $75,000, population 1,866; Front Royal, Va., $50,000, population 1,133; Oconto, Wis., $60,000, population 1,427.

I do not wish to encumber the records and have only cited a few of the most evident cases of gross extravagance, but the bill is replete with provisions of like nature authorizing the appropriation of sums ranging from $40,000 to $100,000 for Government buildings to be located in towns ranging in size from 1,000 to 3,000.

I also notice that in this bill provision is made for the erection of a substation in the city of Chicago at a cost of $60,000.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that the gentleman who has procured this appropriation for that section of our city is overanxious to do something for his district, but let me call his attention to the fact that the erection of a substation in that section of the city means the erection of over 30 similar stations, which would mean an expenditure of close to $5,000,000 and an additional annual outlay of approximately $300,000 for maintenance. In my district I have a substation known as the Pilsen Station; nearly 100 letter carriers and about 50 clerks are employed there, and the yearly receipts amount to over $150,000. All that it costs the Government annually for the rental of this station, including heat and janitor service, is $2,000. I admit that it might be difficult for the Government to secure such favorable leaseholds in other sections of our city, but I know that if honest efforts were made on the part of the Post Office Department we could save from 25 to 40 per cent of the amount we are now expending annually for the rental and maintenance of the post offices throughout the United States. Would it not be much better if at least part of the money which could thus be saved were given to the employees of the department, who are now compelled to accept a wage of less than $15 per week during the first two years of their service?

Mr. Speaker, I am not only in favor of economy in the Post Office Department, but I advocate real and honest economy in every department of the Government, including the Army and Navy, and I desire to serve notice now upon the Members of this House that I shall not only object to and oppose this bill, but any other bills brought before this House which contain items and appropriations which I believe are not absolutely necessary. In conclusion, I desire to express the hope that the gentlemen on this side of the House—for we can expect nothing from the Republicans—will do their utmost to carry out the pledges which we have made to the people, and that they will oppose any and all measures which provide for needless expenditure.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. McCALL,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 9, 1913,

On House resolution 824, paying tribute to the memory of Hon. GEORGE H. UTTER, late a Representative from the State of Rhode Island.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the leave given by the House to give expression, inadequate though it may be, to my own sense of personal loss and of the loss suffered by the country, in the passing of our colleague, GEORGE HERBERT UTTER, late a Representative from the State of Rhode Island. Although he had never served in the House of Representatives before the present Congress, he established in his very brief service a place in its respect which was a very enviable one. His long experience in the house of representatives of his State and in other offices, among them that of governor, had given him a discipline and training which helped him to win his way here. That experience and his native talent peculiarly fitted him for work in a legislative body.

It was my fortune to be his seat mate, and I soon became impressed by his industry and devotion and the ability which he brought to his work. He was a conscientious man, strong in debate, firm in purpose, and always courteous. He was an honor to his splendid little Commonwealth, which, within its narrow boundaries, has presented to the country the spectacle of a large, a prosperous, and an intelligent population. He showed a quality which in a long service would have established him among the leaders of the House. The vacancy in the public service caused by his loss will not be an easy one to fill and keen and lasting will be the sense of sorrow in the hearts of his friends at the departure of a genial companion, an upright and public-spirited man, and a cultivated gentleman.

Building an American Merchant Marine.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STEVEN B. AYRES,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 18, 1913.

I. Building an American Merchant Marine.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, it is necessary to approach problems of shipbuilding in the United States with an open mind. Those to whom any protection is a high misdemeanor and those who can not imagine prosperity without protection are alike disqualified. For here is an industry in which the conditions differ from those in any other. Shipyards can not build ships unless they are to be sold at a profit. They can not be sold at a profit unless the buyers can make a profit in their operation. To operate them at a profit under the American flag the buyer must pay American wages, and in over-sea commerce at least meet the trade competition of those who do not pay American wages. In the making of many products our manufacturers are able to meet and vanquish foreign makers by the greater efficiency of workmen and the use of labor-saving machinery. But in the building of ships there is little use for labor-saving machinery, and in their operation there is none at all. As to whether American sailors and shipyard workmen are as skillful as others opinions differ.

None but ships built in American shipyards can be used in our coastwise trade, and we have a domestic merchant marine carrying our coastwise trade equal to or greater than that of any other nation in the world. And of deep-sea ships carrying our products to other nations we have practically none at all. It is strange, indeed, that we Americans, priding ourselves upon our hard business sense, should be so utterly imbecile as to this.

Imagine a dozen great department stores in the same town, as happens to be the fact in New York City, each of these shops competing keenly for every dollar of trade, each spending great sums in newspaper advertising to make its name known to the buying public. And imagine one of these shops having no delivery system, sending its packages to its customers in the wagons of its rivals, with their names on the wagons, their livery on the driver. We would laugh. We would say that the management of such a shop needed shaking up. Yet here we are competing for trade with every other nation in the markets of the world, forced by the fact of our growing city populations to export more and more manufactured articles year by year, yet sending our goods to our customers in the delivery ships of our rivals, with their flags flying from the masts, their crews handing out the packages. It is too absurd. This America of ours must put in a delivery system of its own.

Let us review for a few moments our marine history to learn, if possible, what has brought our foreign merchant tonnage to such a pitiable plight.

II. The Era of Wooden Ships, 1783–1861.

The regulation and protection of our foreign and domestic commerce was one of the prime considerations which led to the union of the Thirteen Colonies under the Constitution. In section 8, Article I, where the powers granted to Congress are tabulated, six items refer particularly to matters of the marine; and laws designed to build up our shipping interest were among the earliest considered by Congress. At the first session discriminating duties and tonnage taxes were levied on goods imported in any but ships flying our flag. Reasons for this prompt action are plain enough. The 13 new States were stretched along the Atlantic seaboard and the population only extended inland two or three hundred miles, with most of it clustered about navigable rivers. Except for the dirt roads, then even poorer than now, water transportation was the only method of moving either freight or passengers. It was therefore, next to agriculture, much the most important industry. Moreover, so large a percentage of the people had been trained to the sea and so skillful had our sailors become, that many vessels were engaged in the carrying trade between foreign nations, just as now vessels under the flags of Great Britain or of Norway carry cargoes from New York to South America. In fact, the condition of the Thirteen Colonies may be fairly compared with the present state of Norway. The population of Norway now is about two millions; ours in 1790 was about three. Its population is largely a fringe along navigable waters, engaged to a great degree in fishing and other maritime pursuits; ours was just that.

The result of these measures was immediate, so that in four years, by 1793, the tonnage in foreign trade flying the American flag increased 197 per cent and the proportion of our own foreign commerce carried in American bottoms rose from 28 per cent to 79 per cent. Then came the war between Great Britain and France. Our ships were neutral and carried for all while these nations were preying upon each others' merchant marine and, so far as they could find excuse, upon ours. By 1796 our ships were carrying 92 per cent of our foreign commerce. By 1801 and 1802 so much indirect trade was carried that we engaged in conflict with North African States over attacks made on our merchant ships by their pirate vessels. If the Mediterranean were to-day full of hostile Algerian pirates they could hardly capture a merchant vessel flying the Stars and Stripes.

In 1804, Congress doubled the discriminating tonnage tax. Our vessels since 1789 had paid in our harbors a tonnage tax of 6 cents, while English vessels paid 50 cents. Now, Congress raised this tonnage tax to $1. It was one turn of the screw too many. Alarmed at the great increase in our foreign carrying trade, resenting the differentials in our ports, and feeling herself free enough of foreign complications to commence reprisal, Great Britain began to impress our seamen. Then ensued a marine commercial rivalry, which progressed through embargo and nonintercourse acts, through confiscation of ships carrying food and supplies, to the breaking out of active hostilities in 1812. Between 1803 and 1812, Great Britain confiscated 917 of our merchant vessels. Other irritations added to the bad feeling between the two nations, but the cause of this War of 1812, which lasted for three years, was the struggle for the international carrying trade. The war raged wherever the commerce of Great Britain and the United States threatened each other—on the Great Lakes, in West Indian waters, all over the Atlantic, and even in southern waters of the Pacific. Owing to Jefferson's mistaken naval policy, when the war opened we had but five war vessels in commission. A few others were repaired and added to this number. This little fleet performed prodigies of valor, capturing and destroying many times their number of opponents. But, one by one, by superior force, the British picked them off. By 1814 our Navy on the ocean was entirely destroyed, our ports were blockaded, our coastwise cities were ravaged, and Washington burnt. In 1814 peace was declared, and a new marine convention was agreed to the next year.

By this convention Great Britain secured about all she desired. Reciprocity between Great Britain itself and the United States was declared for a period of four years. All our discriminating tonnage duties and tariffs were cut away, and we agreed that trade in her ships sailing direct from Great Britain should be upon the same terms as in our own. In return, it was agreed that our ships sailing direct to Great Britain should trade upon the same terms as hers. But the convention did not extend these privileges to trade between the United States and the West Indies and other colonies. The net result of the war was, therefore, the partial destruction of our international carrying trade and marine reciprocity between Great Britain and the United States in the direct trade.

The commerce of the country was prostrate as a result of the war, and it did not improve as rapidly as it was hoped. Not for 30 years did our tonnage in the foreign trade equal what it was in 1810. In March, 1817, Congress restricted the coastwise trade to vessels of the United States. In October, 1818, a nonintercourse act went into effect. This prohibited vessels from the British colonies trading to the United States, except when the ports of such colonies were open to our ships. By degrees our commerce revived. The building of new ships was resumed. The marine convention of 1815 was renewed. Forests of fine timber for shipbuilding made the raw materials cheap, and although higher wages were paid on this side of the Atlantic than on the other our yards built ships not only for our own use but sold them to foreigners at a profit. By 1828 our vessels were carrying about 87 per cent of our foreign commerce, and the ships in that trade had increased to 757,998 tons.

Congress had been experimenting with reciprocity conventions, and in 1828 another was concluded with Great Britain which again put direct trade between the two Nations on an even balance. In 1849 Great Britain voluntarily opened the ports of her colonies, and this afforded us new markets, and soon helped to increase our tonnage. From 1828 until the war between the States, a period of 33 years, the oversea trade of the United States was mostly carried by our vessels and those of Great Britain.

It has been assumed by advocates of discriminating duties that the lessening percentage of our commerce carried by our own vessels during these years is proof that we could not compete for the carrying trade with Great Britain on even terms.

But this does not follow. The carrying trade was still profitable to us. During the last seven years of this period, 1854–1861, our yards built and sold to foreigners at a profit vessels amounting to 350,000 tons. Improvement in the lines of the hull and in the rigging had made the American clipper ship the best wooden vessel afloat. The building of ships and their operation still returned a profit, probably as great to our yards and owners as to those of Great Britain. But what the commercial history of those years shows is, that while the over-sea trade was still profitable, other business developments here were more profitable, and consequently drew away into other channels part of the surplus wealth that might otherwise have been devoted to marine affairs.

For after this second war with Great Britain our fathers began to discover and develop our own country. Anything but water transportation was hard to obtain. Internal travel was slow and expensive. Freight rates were prohibitive. Toll roads were built by chartered corporations, often aided by subsidies from the States. Pennsylvania is believed to have spent in the improvement of its roads not less than $2,000,000 before 1820. Even the Federal Government took a hand and began the construction of a national highway from the Atlantic to the Mississippi.

The opening of the Erie Canal in 1825 and its great financial success inspired the building of other internal waterways. This waterway reduced on freight from the Great Lakes to New York City the time from 20 days to 10 and the rate from $100 a ton to $10 a ton. From that time until the panic of 1837 many canals were projected and some of them were built. Ohio joined Lake Erie with the Ohio River by two canals. Indiana essayed the feat, with but indifferent success. It was even proposed to tunnel a canal through the Hoosic Mountain in order to give direct water connection to the towns between Boston and the headwaters of the Hudson. But even though freight rates were reduced tremendously wherever canals were operated, passengers and crops moved only slowly by such means.

With the introduction of steam railways, the invention of the telegraph, and the maintenance of cheap postage came a solution of the problem of our internal development. On July 4, 1828, in the same year which witnessed the signing of our reciprocal marine convention with Great Britain, Charles Carroll, the last surviving signer of the Declaration of Independence, drove the first spike in the first rail for the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Instantly almost railroads came into being in different parts of the United States. In 1833 the Charleston & Hamburg Railroad was opened, its 133 miles of track making it at that time the longest commercial railway in the world. By 1841 we had 3,361 miles of railway in operation. In 1860 we had 29,000 miles, of which 1,030 were west of the Mississippi. In 1844 the first telegraph line was in operation between Baltimore and Washington. In 1853 the letter rate of postage was reduced to 3 cents, and the resulting increase in postal service was tremendous. The building of the railways and the financing of the manufacturing development that came along with them absorbed about all the surplus money of the country. Great sums were borrowed abroad. These internal developments were greatly profitable to those who participated, and no more money was put into foreign commerce than seemed absolutely essential.

In 1851 the Erie Railroad was opened as a through line from the Hudson River to Dunkirk on Lake Erie. In 1853 the New York Central was consolidated into a through line from Buffalo to New York City. In 1854 the Pennsylvania Railway was completed and combined as a through trunk line. These through lines caused an immediate increase in our exports and in the tonnage of our ships. But even with this incentive the proportion of foreign commerce carried in our vessels fell steadily away, so that before hostilities began in 1861 our flag was flying over only 65 per cent of our foreign trade.

Let us recapitulate the events of these first 78 years.

1. After the peace treaty with Great Britain in 1783 great prostration of our shipping industry.

2. Immediately after the adoption of the Constitution discriminating tonnage and tariff duties levied. Prompt increase in tonnage and commerce, added to by foreign wars, so that by 1810 large proportion of carrying trade of the world is in our ships.

3. War of 1812, instigated by Great Britain to destroy our commerce, ends in first reciprocal marine convention with Great Britain. Our commerce prostrate; slowly recovers.

4. Fuller reciprocity convention with Great Britain in 1828. Our people largely turn their attention to internal development of the country. Our foreign carrying trade slowly declines, although still profitable at end of period.

In other words, a prostrate industry was stimulated into great prosperity by the protection of discriminating duties and other fortunate trade conditions; and having become prosperous and the industry established by such duties, the protection was withdrawn; but the industry still continued to be profitable against the free competition of the world, although higher wages were paid here than in other countries.

III. The Building of Iron Steamships—1861–1913.

We come now to the second period of our marine history. When the war began shipbuilding became active. Merchant and war vessels were rapidly constructed. In 1864 the new ships for war and other domestic purposes amounted to 350,000 tons. But the foreign trade in American bottoms went to pieces. British yards built privateers, which captured our merchantmen. The war vessels of each side preyed on the commerce of the other. Merchants are timid, and the danger in our foreign trade resulted in a wild scramble to place vessels owned by Americans and carrying our goods under foreign flags. This was accomplished by transfers of title to foreign owners. Here is a record of American ships "sold foreign" during the conflict:

1862	117,756
1863	222,199
1864	300,865
1866	22,117

In the four years of 1862–1865 vessels of 774,652 tons were thus "sold foreign." The result of this safe but unpatriotic process, together with the destruction caused by the war, may be noted in the record of the tonnage sailing in foreign trade under the flag of the United States:

Year ending June 30—	Tons.
1860	2,379,376
1861	2,496,894
1862	2,173,537
1863	1,926,886
1864	1,486,779
1866	1,387,756

When the war was over we thus had a million tons less of foreign shipping than when it began. Congress was busy then reconstructing our tariff policies, but those wise legislators stopped long enough in their arduous labor of raising the tariff on everything that went into the construction of metal ships to enact this neat bit of legislation which still adorns our navigation laws:

Act of February 10, 1866. No vessel which has been recorded or registered as an American vessel of the United States, pursuant to law, and which was licensed or otherwise authorized to sail under a foreign flag, and to have the protection of any foreign Government during the existence of the rebellion, shall be deemed or registered as a vessel of the United States, or shall have the rights and privileges of vessels of the United States, except under provisions of law especially authorizing such registry.

This may have satisfied the patriotic ardor of the reconstructionists, and it certainly kept those particular ships from flying the flag of their American owners. And now, having made it almost impossible by enormous duties on everything that went into the making of iron ships for our builders to begin to construct them in competition with foreign yards, our fathers turned their attention more completely than ever to the development of our internal resources and tried to forget that the ocean existed. The transcontinental railways began to stretch their rails toward the Pacific, and to aid transportation on the land Congress gave subsidies of literally untold millions, in great strips across the continent, while if any hardy soul suggested a subsidy to aid ocean transportation the whole country joined in cries of horror. Now and then some Representative from a seaport might emit a mournful speech about the decadence of our merchant marine, and having done this acquiesced in a little higher duties on steam engines or iron winches, or any one of the numerous things that go into the making of a steel ship. This process was effectual, and in the 25 years from 1865 to 1890 our land transportation had an enormous growth and our ships gradually disappeared.

1890	166,703
United States vessels in foreign trade.
1865 (about)	3,600
1890	1,527

And of this lessening amount only 233 were steamships, the remainder being sailing vessels.

But in 1890 things took a turn for the better. In that year Congress enacted the first legislation tending toward a reduction in the cost of building iron ships in our yards. In the McKinley Act of that year was a provision that wire rope, plates, angles, and beams actually used in any steamship might come in duty free, provided the ship did not engage in the coastwise trade more than two months in the year. The Wilson tariff law of 1894 extended this provision to "all materials" that were necessary for shipbuilding. In 1909 the Payne tariff law repeated this clause and extended the time in the coastwise trade to six months in the year. And in 1912 a paragraph in the Panama Canal act removed this restriction, so that to-day all materials used in the construction of steel vessels, their motive power, or their apparel can come in duty free.

In 1891 Congress again started to encourage shipping by enacting what is known as the ocean mail law. Its principal provisions are as follows:

All vessels employed and receiving compensation must be American-built ships, owned and officered by American citizens. They are divided in four classes:

First. Steel-screw steamships, 20 knots, 8,000 tons, $4 per mile.

Second. Steel-screw steamships, 16 knots, 5,000 tons, $2 per mile.

Third. Steel-screw steamships, 14 knots, 2,500 tons, $1 per mile.

Fourth. Iron or wooden steamships, 12 knots, 1,500 tons, 66 cents per mile.

All vessels must be approved by Navy Department and constructed with special reference to use in time of war as auxiliary naval cruisers.

Each vessel must carry one American-born boy, to be instructed in seamanship, for each 1,000 gross tonnage.

The result of this subsidy has not been all that was expected, although it has caused the construction of about 20 steel vessels.

The law would doubtless have been more effective had it been constructed so as to really encourage the production of steamships in all the trades which are most desirable to our commerce. What we need most besides trans-Atlantic lines is first-class mail and passenger service between New York and the South American cities—Rio de Janeiro, Montevideo, and Buenos Aires—and between our Pacific coast cities and the Orient. Both of these are long journeys, much longer than crossing the Atlantic. The trip to the South American cities is about 5,750 miles. Now, steam navigation in the present state of engineering has its limitations. To move a vessel at the rate of 16 miles per hour takes a certain amount of coal. To move the same vessel at 20 miles per hour takes at least twice as much coal. The consumption of coal increases very rapidly when great speed is required. The distance a steamship can travel is therefore limited by the capacity of its coal bunkers. Such steel ships as the Maurctania, for instance, which are driven at high speed, have only about room enough for the passenger accommodations and the coal necessary for such speeds. Scarcely any freight can be carried. It has not been possible, therefore, to build vessels to run such long distances as 5,750 miles at sufficient speed to earn the $4 a mile payment, because the vessel would have no freight capacity at all; and without it the vessel would not pay. Several attempts have been made in Congress to amend the ocean mail act so as to permit vessels of less speed to earn the larger payment for carrying the mails. But such efforts have thus far failed of success. The reason for this failure is possibly that the country has not seen the difference between paying for a useful regular mail and passenger service and an ordinary mercantile subsidy. Against subsidizing all of our merchant marine the country is firmly and, I believe, very justly set.

The practice of Great Britain, and latterly of Germany, has been to pay for these services to such ships of a line as actually perform the service, leaving it to the other vessels of the line to carry freight without payment. The economic theory upon which such payments are made is that the establishment of a regular fast mail and passenger service between two countries in finely equipped vessels will bring the merchants and travelers of the two countries into a more intimate acquaintance with each other, and thus create an exchange of commodities to be carried in slower freight steamers, which shall be profitable without subsidies. This theory has seemed to work successfully as to Germany with the Hamburg-American and North German Lloyd Lines, and as to Great Britain with the Cunard, the Peninsula & Oriental, and others; while, on the contrary, the attempt of France to create a merchant marine by freight and construction bounties appears not to be profitable.

Since 1892 it has been strongly advanced by many that if it were possible for our merchants to buy foreign-built ships and sail them under our flag that they would do so. It has been pointed out that American shipyards charge more for vessels than foreign yards, and that therefore if vessels could be procured by American shippers at the same prices paid by foreign merchants that American capital would be attracted to our foreign trade and steam lines would be formed for carrying our freight under our own flag. It was further argued that this course would cause no injury to our existing shipyards, because they now build only ships to be used in the restricted coastwise trade, and that it would prove really beneficial to them, since if any ships were thus brought under our flag the repair work incidental to running them would naturally be an addition to the present work in our yards. Sentiment in favor of this proposal grew rapidly, and in the same Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which gave the yards shipbuilding materials free, was incorporated this paragraph, which gives free ships for the foreign trade:

> And seagoing vessels, whether steam or sail, which have been certified by the Steamboat-Inspection Service as safe to carry dry and perishable cargo, not more than 5 years old at the time they apply for registry, wherever built, which are to engage only in trade with foreign countries or with the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila, being wholly owned by citizens of the United States or corporations organized and chartered under the laws of the United States, or of any State thereof, the president and managing directors of which shall be citizens of the United States, and no others, may be registered as directed in this title. Foreign-built vessels registered pursuant to this act shall not engage in the coastwise trade: * * * Provided further, That such vessels so admitted under the provisions of this section may contract with the Postmaster General under the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce," so long as such vessels shall in all respects comply with the provisions and requirements of said act.

About the year 1900 two tendencies became observable, both having influence upon the future of our foreign merchant marine. One was the rapid increase in our foreign trade. It began to grow and is still growing by great leaps. The value of the goods imported into this country and the value of the goods sent out to foreign lands together make up our foreign freight trade. Our foreign passenger traffic consists of the money spent by our merchants and other travelers going to and from foreign lands, and the money spent by aliens in coming to this country and in going away. Always more careful of property than of persons, we have exact figures of the values of our foreign freight trade. The passenger traffic can only be estimated. Here are the figures of our foreign freight trade:

1896	$1,568,410,000
1897	1,822,429,000
1898	1,868,522,000
1899	2,051,899,000
1900	2,282,160,000
1901	2,318,499,000
1902	2,302,585,000
1903	2,453,141,000
1904	2,461,620,000
1905	2,778,568,000
1906	3,093,218,000
1907	3,218,526,000
1908	2,845,044,000
1909	3,176,243,000
1910	3,390,180,000
1911	3,591,480,000
1912	4,217,657,000

This enormous increase of business is continuing, and it is believed that the figures for 1913 when compiled will exceed those for 1912. All this great foreign commerce has tended to stimulate an interest in marine transportation.

The other tendency which became apparent was the entrance of American capital into the carrying trade in much larger amounts than formerly. Because under the commercial conditions now obtaining it costs less to operate vessels under foreign flags than under ours, most of this new capital has gone into ships foreign built and foreign manned. But the fact that American capital is beginning to seek marine investments is highly encouraging.

In 1901 the Bureau of Navigation compiled a list of such vessels, and at that time they amounted to 672,455 tons. Some of those vessels have since been lost, and it is believed in the case of one or two corporations that the majority of stock has passed to foreign owners. But on the other hand, many American owners have largely increased the number of their ships. The United Fruit Co., which then had 5 vessels sailing under the flag of Great Britain and Norway, now has about 100, of which nearly all are flying foreign flags. From all the facts I have been able to gather, I am led to believe that the amount of steam tonnage owned by Americans and engaged in foreign commerce under alien flags now approximates 1,200,000 gross tonnage. When it is considered that the documented steam tonnage engaged in foreign commerce under our own flag, according to the last report of the Bureau of Navigation, is but 520,801 tons, it can be readily understood that there must be some very good reason why American owners sail two-thirds of their ships under foreign flags. These reasons we will presently discuss, but the significant fact to which I wish to call your attention is that the gross amount of steel steamships owned by Americans, under whatever flag operated, has largely increased.

Another fact may here be noted. The growth of ocean-carried freight has increased very much all over the world in the last decade. This has resulted in the active employment of all existing vessels, and within the past year the scarcity of tonnage has been such that ocean freight rates have risen perceptibly. At this new scale of rates it has been found profitable to use American-built and American-manned ships in the foreign trade, and for the first time during the era of metal steamships a few American-built ships, officered by Americans, flying our flag, have been chartered to carry our own products to European ports. This is highly encouraging, although it is much to be feared that if ocean rates should drop our vessels would again find it difficult to compete with foreign tramps. It shows, however, that with only slight encouragement a merchant marine in the foreign trade can be produced.

Recapitulating now our marine history since the building of metal ships began, we find:

First. That the Civil War struck a fatal blow at our foreign marine, which was then almost entirely composed of wooden sailing ships.

Second. That for the 30 years before 1890 the country seemed not only neglectful of our foreign marine but actually hampered the building of steel ships by enormous duties, so that our yards can hardly be said to have made a start toward steel construction.

Third. That beginning with 1890 the disadvantages under which our foreign marine labored have slowly and partially been removed.

Fourth. That if the yet remaining greater cost of building ships in American yards can be equalized and the greater cost of running ships under the American flag can be reduced to a minimum, American capital looks at least with a more friendly mien toward the building and operating a foreign merchant marine under our flag.

IV. The Cost of Building Ships in American Yards.

Let us now consider the cost of building ships in American yards, compared with the costs in British and German yards. Let us look at this subject fairly as it is, now, without regard to any theories of what ought to be or may be. The only kind of ships to be considered are metal steamships, because sailing ships are rapidly disappearing.

Now, if a British owner needs a new cargo steamship of, say, 7,000 tons, to run 15 knots, he goes to any one of a dozen builders and gets a figure on it. To-day the price given him will be about $300,000. If his plans, both for the ship itself and its uses, are acceptable to the builder he can obtain this ship by paying down $30,000 or $40,000 and giving his notes for the remainder at a low rate of interest, payable in annual installments and secured by a mortgage on the vessel. In his turn the shipbuilder takes these notes to his bank, and the bank buys them, and either holds them or places them with individuals who are seeking investments. This is easy in Great Britain because experience there has shown that such notes are safe investments, just as secure as ordinary railroad or commercial paper. Marine notes there are recognized as standard securities, just as notes of railroads and great industrial concerns are regarded here.

If an American shipowner wants the same vessel he gets a price from one of our American shipyards. The price for the same boat is to-day about $375,000. And the owner must pay practically the whole amount in cash when he takes the vessel. The shipyard can not take his notes for part of the payment, because no American shipyard has sufficient capital to carry such notes, and our American banks will not take them in any quantity. The bankers will not take them because there is no market for them. American investors have not been educated to regard them as safe investments, and the bankers can not pass them on, as they can do with railroad notes or notes of industrial concerns. There is a tendency, very slight as yet, for a change in this respect. In the case of a few of our American shipping lines, individual investors have been taking their notes to a limited extent, but bankers are not yet ready to accept them.

What makes the American-built ship to-day cost more than the British or German ship? The reasons are:

First. The higher wages paid to American workmen.

Second. The greater efficiency of British workmen.

Third. The absence as yet of specialization in American yards to particular types of ships.

Wages.

In many manufacturing industries the use of labor-saving machinery has almost eliminated the necessity of high-priced labor. In steel making, for instance. There a workman hardly touches the ores from the time they are mined until the finished frames or rails are stacked upon cars for shipment. Machinery does it all. The labor cost in many branches is not more than 15 per cent of the total cost of the finished article. To put a high protective tariff on such a product is economic idiocy, as is shown by the fact that our steel products are shipped and sold in competition with the world. The same condition exists in other manufacturing branches, such as typewriters and sewing machines and harvesting machinery.

But this is not at all the case with shipbuilding. Here very little labor-saving machinery can be used. In such necessary operations as carrying heavy plates from one part of a yard to another, labor-saving appliances have been thoroughly installed in the best American yards, and such parts of the work are done as cheaply here as abroad. But in the nature of the case the labor cost is a very large percentage of the finished whole. I have been through the books of ship concerns, examined their time sheets, seen the processes, and the labor cost in building a ship is to-day from 40 to 45 per cent of the finished whole. Each ship that comes in to be built is different from every other.

First, the plans must be made and submitted and approved. All skilled labor.

Next, the plans are taken to what is called the "mold loft," and there on a great polished floor, by skilled workmen, laid out and drawn to exact size and the models of each part made of light slips of pine, tacked together. These models are called templets. They must be absolutely exact, or when the steel parts are finally assembled they will not fit together.

Next, these steel parts are made from sheets and frames of steel on great concrete floors and hammered into shape while white hot, mostly by hand labor. Blacksmithing on a grand scale.

Then the rivet holes are punched in the frames and plates by great hydraulic machines. Here labor-saving machinery is used, coupled with hand labor. The number of rivet holes punched and the number of rivets driven on a steel ship is almost unbelievable.

Next, the frames and plates are assembled, being carried by powerful cranes and dropped into place, and these great sheets are riveted together by workmen, who heat the steel rivets in little electric furnaces and drive them into place.

And so we could go on with each process. But suffice it to say that when the ship is finished from 40 to 45 per cent of the cost to the builder is in labor. About an equal per cent is in the cost of materials. The remainder is the administrative or overhead charge.

The materials that go into a ship cost no more here to-day than abroad. Some articles are a little more costly, some less. Steel parts are to-day perhaps slightly cheaper here than there. But the material cost is about the same in our yards here as in foreign yards.

With the labor cost it is entirely different. The average weekly earning of all the employees in the English shipyards is about $7.60. The average in Germany is about the same. In the shipyards of the United States the weekly wage averages about $13.50. These figures of course include both skilled and unskilled labor, all the labor that goes into the making of a vessel.

Efficiency.

We are very proud here of the greater efficiency of American labor in many branches of endeavor. Our scale of living, the climate, with its result on the national temperament, our unfixed social castes—all doubtless contribute to this efficiency. But it is to be noted that our labor has been most efficient in the development of those industries which are in a sense indigenous here, in the production of articles invented here or in which improvements have been developed here. The business of building steel ships did not originate here, nor have improvements in the type of construction developed here.

On the contrary, hampered by hostile legislation and the absence of public interest, shipbuilding here, until recently, has been an imitative trade, following slavishly the methods originated elsewhere. Commercial experts often come to investigate and adopt our methods and machinery in trades where we excel, but in shipbuilding we are still learning from our British rivals. It is only within the last half dozen years that our big yards have learned to build as good cargo vessels as are built abroad. Now they are doing it, but the vessels are costing more.

Standardization.

There are so many British yards that specialization has taken place there. Some yards build one kind of vessel, some another. If you go to some admiralty yard there and inquire the price of a cheap cargo vessel you will be told that the yard does not build such vessels. But you will be directed to a yard that builds only that type and is building it all the time. It is reasonable to suppose that such a yard can build cheaper. The designs, the models, the frames, the plates are the same for one boat as for the next. It is like buying a suit of clothes made to order or ready made.

There is not business enough here yet to permit such specialization. If you go to Newport News or Cramps or Fore River you will find on one berth a cargo boat, and next to it a battleship, and then perhaps a collier, and then a river steamer. Such heterogeneous building scarcely permits of standardizing. However, about four or five years ago two of our yards commenced to build a set type of cargo boat that has stood up well and been profitable to operate. And now when an order for a freighter comes in the adoption of this type is urged. It is an interesting fact that these yards find that they can build each succeeding boat of this kind not only a little better, but a little cheaper. If the opening of the Panama Canal stimulates shipping, as is hoped, we shall doubtless find our builders able to get nearer to British and German costs in a few years.

There is no doubt, however, that at the present time it does cost more to build boats in our yards. From a careful and patient investigation of all the processes, including the overhead charge of superintendence, I am convinced that the difference in cost is from 20 per cent to 25 per cent. The shipyard owners themselves assert that the difference is much greater. But I believe the difference is about as stated above, caused almost entirely by the greater wages paid in this country.

It ought to be said here, in justice to our shipyards, that the often repeated accusation that they are combined in a trust to keep up prices has no basis in fact. The competition between them is keen.

It should also be stated that battleships can be built as cheap here as anywhere else. But this is because the hardened armor plate and the big guns are much cheaper than abroad. And the cost of the armor and guns is a large part of the cost of a battleship.

V.

Conceding, then, that many of the obstructions in the way of building a foreign merchant marine have been removed, but that it yet costs more to build steamships in our yards, and somewhat more to run them under our inspection laws, I believe if our foreign marine could once be given a start till it is prosperous, that it will remain so. What, then, are we to do to bring about the conditions so much desired? Some courses are not open to us.

We can not cut down the wages of our sailors to accord with foreign wage scales; that would drive out of the business what few Americans are in it.

We can not cut down the wages in American shipyards, because the employees would immediately go into other and better-paid industries.

We can not pay subsidies to our merchant marine. The temper of the time is justly and firmly opposed to such economic favoritism.

We can not safely create discriminating duties in our direct trades or lay discriminating tonnage or port charges. Such laws would conflict with all our treaties and lead to reprisals on the part of other nations.

But there are three courses of action open, either of which, if adopted, would enormously stimulate our foreign-carrying trade. These are:

First. To charge no tolls through the Panama Canal to our coastwise trade, and to establish ports of entry in the Canal Zone.

Second. To establish discriminating duties upon the indirect carrying trade.

Third. To establish an interoceanic commerce commission to regulate water-borne traffic in which we are interested, just as our Interstate Commerce Commission regulates our transportation on the land.

Let us consider these projects in detail to see if either or all of them should be adopted.

VI. Influence of the Panama Canal.

By virtue of our purchase of the Canal Zone from the Republic of Panama we became seized of sovereign rights in that territory, subject only to the conditions of the treaty by which it was acquired. Article 3 gives to the United States all the right, power, and authority that the United States would possess if it were sovereign. Article 2 excepts from the operation of the grant the city of Panama on the Pacific side and the city of Colon on the Atlantic side, with the harbors adjacent thereto. These ports remain under the sovereignty of the Republic of Panama and are therefore foreign ports.

Notwithstanding this exception, however, the rights of the United States as sovereign undoubtedly extend to the creation of new ports. These new ports which may be established are undoubtedly the ports referred to in the first and second lines or article 9 of the treaty. The cities of Panama and Colon and their harbors being reserved to the Republic of Panama, and that Republic agreeing in article 9 specifically with reference thereto, the agreement of the United States above referred to, in the first and second lines of article 9, and again in the seventeenth and eighteenth lines of that article as to "ports at either entrance of the canal and the waters thereof," and, again, "such ports" must relate to new ports thereafter to be established. The United States, having the right to establish new ports, would undoubtedly have the right to regulate them, so that such regulation be not in conflict with the remaining provisions of the treaty.

Shipment of freight from New York through the canal to the city of Panama would be a foreign shipment, because the city of Panama is within the sovereignty of the Republic of Panama. The same may be said of a shipment from San Francisco to Colon. But a shipment from a port of the United States to any other port on the Canal Zone not included in the limits of these cities or their harbors would be coastwise business of the United States.

By referring to the map of the Canal Zone dated June 30, 1911, accompanying the annual report of the Isthmian Canal Commission it will be found that the limits of the cities and harbors of Colon and Panama are indicated by yellow boundary lines. At the harbor of Colon the greater portion of Limon Bay, which is immediately contiguous to the canal entrance, is outside the limits of Colon Harbor. Limon Bay thus affords the site for a port and harbor of the United States to the landward of Colon and Colon Harbor, that portion of Limon Bay available for a harbor of the United States being about two miles and a quarter one way by three miles the other. A 500-foot channel has been cut through Limon Bay directly to the entrance of the canal.

The limits of the city of Panama and its harbor are entirely to the southward of the entrance to the canal on the Pacific side, and the closest approach of these limits to the canal is 1 mile to the southward thereof as the crow flies, but by reason of the existence of the breakwater is practically 8 miles distant from the canal entrance. Therefore there is abundant room for a port and harbor of the United States at the mouth of the canal on the west coast.

Shipments from any port in the United States to a port of the United States located at either end of the Canal Zone would be coastwise. Balboa, lying on the western side of the canal, is an existent port of the United States, and Mindi, on Limon Bay, on the east side of the canal, may undoubtedly be created into a port in law, as it already seems to be a port in fact, of the United States. Shipments from any part of the United States either to Mindi or Balboa would be coastwise. If such shipments traverse the canal, being coastwise, they would go through free under the provisions of the Panama Canal bill.

Section 4322 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides:

> The collectors of the several districts may enroll and license any vessel that may be registered upon such registry being given up, or may register any vessel that may be enrolled upon such enrollment and license being given up.

If there were collectors at these ports (the ports being within a collection district) the existing law governing the coastwise trade would permit a vessel to proceed on enrollment coastwise from a port in the United States through the canal and to either Mindi or Balboa and, under section 4322, exchange her coastwise enrollment for a registry and then proceed foreign, with the freight with which she was laden reconsigned at one or the other of the said ports for a foreign port. It is apparent that this result may be accomplished if officers are designated by the President having the power at Mindi and Balboa to exercise at said ports the power of a collector of a customs district with respect to the shipping at such ports so far as the same are not in conflict with the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama.

Coastwise vessels of the United States being exempt from the payment of tolls, and the right to change from an enrollment to a registry being a privilege reserved to every coastwise vessel, the result would be that all cargoes carried in vessels of the United States from ports on the eastern coast of the United States to ports on the west coast of South America and to all Asiatic ports would be given a rate differential equal to the amount of the tolls over cargoes carried from and to the same ports in vessels of any other country. A cargo of 6,000 tons, for example, would therefore pay a freight rate of $7,200 less if carried in a vessel of the United States than if carried in a vessel of any other country. Similar benefits would inure to all cargoes from ports on the west coast of the United States to all ports of Europe, Africa, and the east coast of South America.

It is apparent that a differential of such magnitude would soon compel all our shippers to use vessels of the United States in preference to vessels of other countries, as they are now doing, in all the direct trade of the United States using these routes. The present freight rates between these ports would be reduced and benefit would come to all shippers and consumers in the United States in accordance therewith.

Doubtless it is fear of such a policy being adopted by the United States that has led Great Britain to make so earnest a protest against the remission of tolls to our coastwise vessels through the Panama Canal. And doubtless her spokesmen would protest such a policy as being bad faith on our part.

Great Britain has by every means within her power since the adoption of our Constitution endeavored to obtain control of our carrying trade. In the early days, when we were weak, she made war upon us. Since that time, while we have been giving attention to the development of our land resources and have neglected the sea, she has obtained and now retains control of our foreign carrying trade by all forms of combines, together with pooling and rebate systems—unlawful in the United States. The construction of the Panama Canal has placed in our hands a means of combatting the unjust methods hitherto used against us. And now, when her statesmen see fully what a valuable instrument we have obtained, her cry is that we are a faithless Nation.

VII. Discriminating Duties in the Indirect Trade.

Let us first have a plain understanding as to the difference between what is termed direct trade and indirect trade. If, for example, a vessel flying our flag carries a cargo from a port in the United States to a port of Brazil, that, so far as we are concerned, is direct trade. If the same vessel then loads at the Brazilian port and carries a cargo thence to Liverpool, that, so far as we are concerned, is indirect trade. If the same vessel then brings a cargo from Liverpool to any port of the United States, it is again direct trade. A vessel which carries between a port of her own country and a port of any foreign country is engaged in direct trade. A vessel which carries from a port in one foreign country to another port in the same or another foreign country is engaged in indirect trade. Now, fair trade between two nations presupposes that the direct trade between them shall be carried partly in the vessels of each. When such trade is carried, not in the vessels of either nation, but in the vessels of a third country, foreign to both of them, an injury has been done to the commerce of both nations whose trade has been thus interfered with.

Our direct commerce with South America, such as between the eastern ports of the United States and Santos, Rio, Montevideo, and Buenos Aires, is almost all carried by the ships of Great Britain—indirect trade to her. This is trade that should be ours, and could readily be reclaimed if a discriminating tariff duty were levied against vessels carrying indirectly. If all the tariff duties levied upon the products of these South American countries were lessened by 5 per cent ad valorem when brought to us in vessels of the United States, these products would soon all be carried in our vessels. Upon such products as now come in free a tariff of 5 per cent might be levied if brought in the vessels of any third country. This would soon restrict such commerce to vessels of the United States and vessels of the nation with which we are trading. A discriminating tariff of 5 per cent seems small, but let us compute what it would be on a cargo of 1,000 tons of coffee. A ton of coffee is valued at about $300. One thousand tons would be worth about $300,000. A 5 per cent duty would amount to $15,000. If it cost the consignee $15,000 less when carried in a vessel of the United States, he would promptly arrange to have it carried in a vessel flying our flag. A discriminating duty levied on the indirect trade would in five years give all the carrying to our own vessels and those of the nations with which we are directly trading.

The advantage of a duty against the indirect trade is that it will be subject to no harmful reprisals. If we levy such duties and Great Britain and Germany make reprisals in kind, we shall be utterly indifferent. Such duties can not harm us, because our vessels are carrying no indirect trade. All we hope for in the present and for years to come is to reclaim our own share of our direct trade.

Another advantage is that discriminating duties in the indirect trade will not so vitally affect our treaties. Some provisions will have to be changed, but our commercial relations will not be so much disturbed as if we levied discriminating duties on the direct trade.

Inasmuch as nearly all our foreign commerce, except with Great Britain, Germany, France, and Japan, is now carried by vessels engaged in indirect trade, such a provision would in a brief time restore to our vessels the direct trade with all the remainder of the commercial world. Our shipbuilding establishments would be given an enormous addition to their present output. And it is not a strain upon credulity to believe that with this added demand for vessels and the consequent opportunity to specialize in types of deep-sea-going craft, they might be able to soon construct ships at approximately the same prices charged by foreign builders. When that time comes discriminating duties will have served their purpose and may thereafter be abolished.

VIII. A Commerce Commission to Govern the Sea.

In a room of the Produce Exchange Building in New York City meets, on Monday of each week, representatives of the steamship lines which carry all our products to Brazilian ports. There they fix the rates that American freight to our sister Republic shall pay. They fix also the price that American citizens shall pay for traveling to Brazil. If they can not agree, they cable to the owners of these lines in England, for they are all British or German lines, and the final decision is made in London.

All the steamship lines that carry freight to and from the Argentine are governed by a like conference which meets each week in New York City. If the representatives can not agree, they cable to the owners in Great Britain, for these lines also are all British and German, and the final word is said in London. The owner of one of these lines is Mr. Houston, who is a member of Parliament. No rate can be agreed upon until he is satisfied. In other words, we are in such a pass that a member of the British Parliament practically dictates the price it shall cost us to ship American manufactures to our customers in foreign lands.

Last summer some merchants of New Orleans tried to establish an American line to run from their city to Brazilian ports. They sent down three ships loaded with American machinery, one after another, but they could not get a ton of freight on the return voyages. So the venture didn't pay and they gave it up. The reason they could not get any return freight was because these British lines running from Brazil to the United States had established a system of deferred rebates with all the merchants in the Brazilian ports. They have a monopoly and they had made contracts with these merchants by which, if the merchants used these British lines only, after each six months they get a rebate of 10 per cent on all the freights they have paid. If during this time a merchant has once shipped freight by any other line, he loses his rebate for the whole six months. It might well be, also, that if a merchant shipped just once by an independent boat, the conference lines would not take his freight at all for awhile. They might not have room for his freight. At least, that is what these merchants think.

Is not such a situation intolerable? And when you think that all our trade with all parts of the earth—to Great Britain, and to France, and to Germany, and to South Africa, and to Australia—all our goods carried by steamship lines owned and operated by foreigners, all in combines and mostly giving rebates—when you think of these things does not it, in all candor, seem that we Americans have neglected our ocean commerce just about long enough?

It is not because Congress has not power to regulate commerce, but because our people have been so busy filling up the free spaces in our continent with towns and factories and railroads that they have not cared much what happened on the sea. Congress has plenty of power, granted by the Constitution. In times past Congress has prohibited the shipping of any products at all. At one time no British vessels were allowed to clear at any of our ports. There is no question as to the power of Congress to establish the conditions upon which foreign vessels may enter and clear at our ports.

What must be done is to establish a tribunal like our Interstate Commerce Commission, which shall have power to fix the rates of freight and passenger service on the ocean. Then Congress can enact a law making combines of ocean lines illegal, making rebating illegal, and refusing permission to any steamship line to do business in our ports if it be guilty of these practices. That would stop it, and it would make ocean freights uniform and reasonable and give American lines a chance to do business if the extra cost of running ships under our flag is equalized by the use of the Panama Canal and discriminating duties on our indirect trade.

It would also be in the province of this marine commerce commission to fix the rates that shall be charged for freight and passengers. And also to fix the frequency of service and to see that shippers are all put on an equality. Then we could be sure that foreign steamship lines do not discriminate against our products and turn business away from American merchants and factories.

Perhaps it would be better to enlarge our present Interstate Commerce Commission by the addition of two more members, and have the commission in two departments, one to look after railroad rates and the other to supervise ocean rates. This would avoid creating the machinery for a separate establishment and would bring about the desired purpose just as well.

IX.

In conclusion, may I express the wish that some of the patriotic Members of the incoming Sixty-third Congress, soon to be called in special session, will introduce bills to accomplish the purpose indicated; and also that the Democratic majority in both Houses see to it that these measures be enacted into law?

Aside from an adjustment of the tariff and the enactment of a satisfactory currency law no subject is of greater importance to the future commercial well-being of our Nation than the upbuilding of our merchant marine. We have become a world power, we have outgrown the limits of our wonderful and productive mainland. It is the hope of every patriotic American that we now take our proper place upon the sea, so that the Stars and Stripes may proudly float from our vessels in every quarter of the globe.

Immigration.

SPEECHES

OF

HON. JOHN L. BURNETT,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 17, 1913, and Wednesday, February 19, 1913.

The House had under consideration the conference report on the bill (S. 3175) entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States."

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, the illiteracy test in the immigration bill as it passed the House underwent scarcely any change at all in the Senate. In fact, the only change that I remember that was made there was to meet a suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] that the expression "the language of some other country" might exclude Polish people. In order that there might be no question on that proposition, the conferees agreed upon the words "some other language" instead of "the language of some other country."

The part of the Senate bill that has been adopted by the conferees contains mainly administrative features.

There were two propositions involved in the original Senate bill to which there was a great deal of objection all over the country, especially before our Committee on Immigration. One was what was known as the Root amendment. That has been stricken out. Another was what was known as the requirement that those who entered should receive certificates of identification. That has been stricken out. The Senate had a clause requiring that aliens should be able to write as well as read. On that the House adhered to their bill and the Senate receded. It simply provides for their ability to read. The exemptions and exceptions to the illiteracy test which passed the House are all included in the bill that we report back to the House.

I will briefly call attention to the principal changes that were made, so far as the Senate was concerned. There is an increase of the head tax from $4 to $5. It has been $4 for several years. So far as I am concerned, I have never been in favor of the head tax as a method of restriction of immigrants, but I believe that the receipts from immigration should at least take care of the expenses incurred in that bureau. It is paid by the steamships. That increase was made in view of the fact that we believed the illiteracy test would cut off nearly 200,000 immigrants. Receipts will be reduced in that way. There are other provisions that will cause additional expense.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURNETT. No, Mr. Speaker, I decline to be interrupted, because the time is too brief now for me to explain these provisions. We make one change, an administrative change, for the protection of immigrants on shipboard. It was brought to our attention that frequently these poor, unfortunate steerage passengers had been mistreated and abused in many ways, and we have provided a method of protection which will increase the expense, that of providing a surgeon and matrons and inspectors on these ships. We provide further that there may be interior stations established if the Secretary of Commerce and Labor thinks it is necessary, and he may deputize inspectors to attend these immigrants, not to pay their passage but to attend the immigrants themselves when they are desirous of going to interior places, to see that they are properly protected.

We have made it permissible for the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to decide beforehand the necessity of importing skilled labor when other labor of the same kind can not be found in the community. We did it for this reason. He does not pass on the question of whether the people are admissible, but on the question whether there exists the necessity for that labor, because it was found that sometimes skilled laborers were brought over and after they got here it was decided that there was no necessity for their coming, and it was a great hardship to have to exclude the people coming in under such contracts, although the law allowed them to come in, where labor of the same kind could not be had in this country. That question is to be first decided—the question of necessity—and then when they come in they are subjected to examination like other immigrants.

We provide more severe penalties against the transportation lines that violate the law against advertising for immigrants and that bring aliens to the United States who are ineligible to enter. This House passed a bill last Wednesday, and we incorporate that here, penalizing the steamship companies for bringing in alien insane and inflicting penalties from $100 to $200, because we believe it would make them more careful to stop such people before they get to this side and do away with the expense of their coming over here and being returned.

We provide machinery for compelling the attendance and testimony of witnesses before the immigration authorities when required. Heretofore they have had great trouble in securing the attendance of witnesses, and we believed that it should be put up to the courts of the country to show whether, if necessary, the attendance of witnesses was required, and if so to have process for contempt provided if necessary to get them.

We have also a provision for the deportation of aliens who become criminals within three years subsequent to entry. That is, Mr. Speaker, those who are under the law now subject to exclusion, we exclude within three years if they become criminals. We have a provision for the deportation of those who have committed crimes involving moral turpitude within three years after their admission. We have also provided a requirement that immigrants from those countries that require and keep criminal records shall bring those certificates with them, in order to keep out as many criminals as possible. We can not apply it to everybody, and I would not be in favor of that, because there are some countries that do not keep those records, and because many countries that emigrants come from do not desire their people to come here; but some of the worst ones can be provided for. In Italy their criminal records are required to be kept, and they are required to bring them along, in order to keep them out of our own country. It would not affect aliens from any other country, for no other country requires criminal records or records of character kept.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield for a question?

Mr. BURNETT. No, I can not do so; I have declined heretofore. Now, Mr. Speaker, we provide against the illegal entry of deserting alien seamen and stowaways. Within the last two years more than 15,000 seamen have deserted from vessels, and under the law as it now exists they could not be deported. We have not required absolute deportation on account of the fact that they were deserting seamen, but we have provided that when they have deserted they shall be taken before the board of inquiry, just like any other immigrant, and if found to be admissible, all right; and if not, they shall be deported, but not upon the ships that bring them in, because that would permit those ships to penalize them, and in that way conflict with the law which the House passed a short time ago on that proposition.

We have also liberalized the law in regard to aliens being represented by counsel. As the law is now, they can be represented by counsel neither before the board of inquiry nor upon an appeal. It was thought if they were represented by counsel before the board of inquiry it would entail very great expense and confusion, and we were not willing to go that far; but we made the law so that the board of inquiry, in passing upon the admissibility, if it rejected them, should state to the immigrants that they are entitled to take an appeal, and that on that appeal they can be represented by counsel.

We provide experts on insanity at the large ports. Great complaint has come to us from New York and many of the North Atlantic States about the insufficiency and inadequate examinations at Ellis Island, at Boston and Philadelphia, and other ports, not on account of the laxity in the enforcement of the law, but on account of the great number coming in there it was impossible to make that careful examination on the question of insanity that was thought necessary. For that reason we have provided for the deputizing of expert alienists from our hospital service to make examination at these ports.

We have defined the word "alien," and these, I believe, Mr. Speaker, are the principal changes that we have made. Many of these sections that gentlemen have been frightened about are absolutely reiterations of the old law. It is codifying the old law. That has been the system under which we have acted for many years. In March, 1903, the law was recodified, and in 1907 it was recodified, and now this is a recodification, with some changes that we have made, and the adoption almost in toto of the House bill so far as the illiteracy test is concerned, and making the penalties greater against the steamship companies, who are the great violaters of the law. After all, they are the ones, in my judgment, who get up more of this agitation and more of the opposition whenever these bills come up than any other people. I have never been an extremist on this question. I desire to encourage the good immigrants, and yet whenever any agitation comes up looking to restriction, all over the country the agents of the steamship companies are telegraphing and making out to the Jews and Germans and other good citizens that it is a blow at their particular race, when no such thing is intended.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a simple question?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Would this bill apply to foreign ministers and their families?

Mr. BURNETT. No; that is provided for.

Mr. MANN. I see you struck out that provision.

Mr. BURNETT. We merely transferred it to another place.

Wednesday, February 19, 1913.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I doubt if in the history of the country as short a message has ever been sent in by the President of the United States on so important a question as this one. In a few lines the President seems to waive his responsibility and place it entirely upon the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Any gentleman who has investigated this question and will read the statements of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, will see that it is bristling with misinformation or misstatements all the way through.

We have been trying for years to get a vote on this question. A commission investigated it for several years. Congress has had it up for months, and by a vote of 200 to 62 we passed the bill at one time. The Senate yesterday, composed in part of men who have been friends of the President all the way through, and who have always been his political and personal adherents, did not hesitate to say that he was wrong, and, following their sense of duty and their obligation to their oaths, voted to pass this bill over his veto. I am sure that none of our Democratic friends, and I hope that no one of our friends on the other side, will swerve from their duty in view of the great responsibility resting upon them when this bill is now, as I hope, about to become a law. Merely because you want to follow your distinguished leader, my Republican friends, do not shirk that responsibility which is a personal one on every man in this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] consumed four minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask a question.

Mr. BURNETT. Briefly, if you please.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want to know if the Commissioner General of Immigration, who has been in close touch with this immigration question, and who has studied the labor question for a number of years, did not recommend in his report some time ago that there be a literacy-test law?

Mr. BURNETT. That was stated by him, but was eliminated from the printed report.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is it not a fact that the Commissioner of Immigration did that?

Mr. BURNETT. I think so.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. I can not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, if this bill is defeated it will be the absentees who will do it, and the people in the next election should hold them responsible for it. The RECORD will show their names, and at the bar of popular indignation they should be called to account. The people demand this legislation, the welfare of our whole country demands it, and no ordinary excuse ought to be received by the people from those who by their absence jeopardize its passage.

OF
HON. SYDNEY ANDERSON, OF MINNESOTA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 19, 1913.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech.

I prepared the speech which follows for delivery to the House more than a year ago. It was not delivered, however, on account of the action of the House in passing a resolution providing for investigation of the feasibility of constructing a railroad in Alaska by the Federal Government and the relative merits of the several routes proposed.

The commission provided by the resolution has since made its investigation and report and its conclusions and recommendations so closely approximate the proposal contained in H. R. 15931, which I introduced December 15, 1911, that I feel warranted in placing the speech in the RECORD at this time under leave to print.

The speech is as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I desire as briefly as possible to call the attention of the committee to H. R. 15931, introduced by myself, being a bill to provide for the construction of a national railway in the Territory of Alaska. I was the pioneer in advancing the idea that the key to proper development and conservation of the natural resources of Alaska for the benefit of the whole people was to be found in the construction and operation of a railroad by the National Government. I began study of the question a year ago last December, and since then I have devoted such time to it as I could without serious interference with other official duties. I prepared a bill during the first session of the Sixty-first Congress and should have introduced it in that session but for the fact that there was some doubt in my mind as to whether the road should start from Controller Bay or from some other point. I believe we are now in possession of information which practically disposes of that question; but before going into that feature of the matter I want to say that I have no particular pride of opinion in the matter generally or in the phraseology of the bill which I introduced. The committee should, I think, hear every one who can offer intelligent suggestion upon the subject and draw a bill which will include the best features and suggestions offered.

My purpose in introducing the bill was to bring the question to the exact stage which it has now reached, that of a definite basis for intelligent and specific debate. It must be admitted, of course, that no one knows all about Alaska; but we are in possession of vastly more information upon the subject to-day than we were a year ago.

I presume there is no doubt in the mind of anyone of the constitutional power of the Government to construct and operate a railroad in Alaska or anywhere else within the confines of the jurisdiction of the United States, and I shall therefore not submit any argument upon that point. That question is fully discussed in Interior Department Bulletin No. 36, 1911.

In its general features the bill is based upon existing law authorizing the appointment of a commission for the construction and operation of the Panama Canal and upon the various railroad grants made by the United States, particularly those to the Union Pacific Railroad Co. I took this basis for the reason that the language and general provisions of these proposals already had the approval of Congress and in some respects have been construed by the Supreme Court.

The bill provides for a survey of a right of way not less than 200 yards in width for a national railroad beginning at or near Seward and terminating at or near the Matanuska coal fields by the best and most available route, with a view of the further extension of the railroad to the interior of Alaska. While the bill does not so provide, my idea was that the termination of the railroad would be at some point on the Tenana branch of the Yukon River, probably at Fairbanks. I selected Seward for the beginning point of the road on account of its location on Resurrection Bay, using the word "at" or "near" because it is quite likely, if not entirely probable, that some other point on Resurrection Bay other than the town of Seward would be more available and better adapted to the purpose intended than Seward.

There are many reasons for locating the starting point of the railroad at Resurrection Bay, some of which it seems to me are controlling. In the first place, this bay offers a large, deep-water, natural harbor large enough to hold the entire Navy of the United States. The harbor is 11 miles long and has a general depth of 149 feet and is extremely well protected. The entrance to the bay can be fortified like Gibraltar. It is farther to the westward than Kulalla or Cordova and affords an ideal rendezvous, being nearer to Japan and Manila than is Honolulu, and at the same time nearer to the Pacific coast than is Honolulu. But there are other important reasons for locating the starting point of this railroad on Resurrection Bay. It has a good route to the interior and one which will naturally lead the railroad through the best agricultural valleys of Alaska, on the Matanuska and Susitna Valleys, which the best information shows are equal for agricultural purposes to the best land in the Dakotas. In addition, this route naturally lends itself to branch roads and extensions to Fairbanks through Broad Pass and across the Kuskokwim to the Yukon at Nulato or Koltag, and thence on to Nome. Every mile of this road thus built will shorten the winter route by that much. Besides the great agricultural development which must necessarily follow, the opening up of this territory by a railroad will open an immense region of gold and copper mines and low-grade placer which can only be profitably worked with cheaper transportation. The value of this proposed route is perhaps best determined by its comparison with a proposed route from Controller Bay. At the outset those who know maintain that Controller Bay has no practicable route to the interior. It is really not a harbor at all and could only be made a harbor by the expenditure of a large amount of money, and even then could only be reached by several miles of road over the shore line over mud flats. Wharves and bunkers would have to be built seven or eight miles from the shore line.

Much trouble will be experienced with ice coming out of the river and glaciers in the spring. In addition to this Controller Bay is exposed in three directions to some of the most dangerous storms on the Alaskan coast. It has the advantage of being nearer to the Bering River coal fields than any other harbor, but this to my mind is by no means a controlling reason for establishing it as the starting point of a railroad to the interior. The Matanuska coal fields, which would be reached by the proposed route from Seward, are both larger and better than the Bering fields. A much smaller percentage of these fields have been located, and in addition many of the locations in the Bertinn River field are now being litigated and will perhaps not be settled for many months. Coal operations could be commenced in the Matanuska coal fields immediately. The nearest good harbor to the Bering fields is the one at Cordova, now occupied by the Guggenheims. They spent millions of dollars in investigation and abandoned their attempts to build a breakwater at Cordova after spending a million dollars there. They investigated Controller Bay fully, but did not even attempt it, and it may be appropriately said here that the Guggenheim company is usually pretty well advised. Probably if a road is ever built to the Behring River it should be built from Cordova, but I think this project will not be justified for many years.

There are some general considerations which I desire to touch upon in connection with the construction of some road as an integral part in our plan of developing Alaska. It is generally conceded that in whatever way this development takes place it must be safeguarded against monopoly. A bare glance at the history of the development of the coal fields in this country established the conclusions that the control of transportation has been the single largest force in the establishment of monopolies of coal fields in this country.

The establishment of this road would do away with the necessity of any extensive operations of the coal fields by the Government, and in conjunction with a leasing system would unquestionably prevent any monopoly of the coal fields. Moreover, in a broad sense, the development of the western coast is dependent upon the development of Alaska. Conditions now are such that great numbers of United States citizens are emigrating to British Columbia, which is, in effect, the back door of Alaska, thus losing to the United States, and particularly to the West, the productive forces of a great number of our citizens, as well as the advantages which would come from the development of Alaska, if these persons who now emigrate to British Columbia could be induced by the offer of fair opportunities to take up the development of that Territory. I am in receipt of several letters which make plain the situation in this respect. One from a gentleman whom I know personally, and who travels out of Minneapolis, Minn., covering the Northwest and Alaska, says:

> This year there has been no business in Alaska, so I have not gone there. Seattle, Tacoma, and Portland are dead—why? Because Alaska is dead. I am told on all sides that our people are passing over into Canada and that British Columbia is having a boom, caused by Americans going there by thousands. Everyone here feels it is an absolute disgrace to the United States that Alaska is not opened up. It has great agricultural valleys, such as the Matanuska, Susitna, Chulitna, and Cantwell, capable of supporting an agricultural population of 3,000,000. I have seen land north of Seward, in Alaska, producing 100 bushels of oats to the acre; so why force our people into Canada when we have these great valleys yet to settle up? All they require is transportation. Everyone in this city is at present living in the hope that Congress will at this session pass legislation opening up Alaska.
> If it fails to do so, despair will seize them here and thousands more will pass over to British Columbia. This exodus is a serious thing. It is draining the Northwest and Pacific coast of the youngest and best blood that the country has, and is also taking millions in cash out of the country; and the people wherever I go firmly believe that the opening up of Alaska will do more to stop this exodus than any other thing.

The land men of Canada say in their advertisements that Central British Columbia is "the last Great West of the American Continent."

That is true if Alaska is not opened up. British Columbia is draining the vast resources of the United States in cash and in citizenship. I am told that British Columbia alone in the last five years drained the United States of $157,000,000 in cash, and that $110,000,000 in settlers' effects passed over from the United States to British Columbia during that period. Minnesota alone, according to Mr. J. H. Beek, secretary of the Association of Commerce in St. Paul, sent over to Canada $6,000,000 and 2,000 citizens in 1911. I submit the following table, given out by the North Coast Land Co., of Vancouver, British Columbia, as indicating the extent of this exodus of money and citizens to British Columbia:

British Columbia cash	$37,546,000
Settlers' effects, valued at	18,773,000
United States cash	157,260,000
United States settlers' effects, valued by customs officers at	110,082,000
Non-English-speaking cash	2,419,000
Total	326,080,000

Mr. S. P. Brannan, 608 Rector Building, Chicago, Ill., writing of this matter, says:

> I was out to the Pacific coast last fall and returned by way of the Canadian Pacific and was astonished to see the evidences of great prosperity on every side in British Columbia, while in Seattle and Washington State times were hard everywhere. So that from my observations while there I firmly believe that these advertisements do not overstate the truth.

The development of Alaska is well worthy of consideration from the viewpoint of this exodus.

The bill further provides for the construction of the railroad, after the survey and selection of a route, by and through a commission similar to that appointed for the construction of the Panama Canal, consisting of five members, two of whom shall be persons learned and skilled in the operation of railroads and the science of engineering, one an officer of the United States Army, one an officer of the United States Navy, and the fifth an actual resident of Alaska familiar with mining conditions in the Territory. It is believed that the appointment of such a commission would assure a proper and proportionate consideration of the various questions of location, construction, and operation involved in the bill.

It further provides in section 5 for the condemnation or purchase of the right of way, contracts, and appurtenances of any existing railroad, if such a course would facilitate, in the judgment of the President, the general purposes of the act.

There is now in existence a railroad from Seward to Kern Creek, 72 miles, built by the Alaska-Northern Railway Co. and now owned by Canadian bondholders who foreclosed the mortgage. It is thought that this road could be utilized as a part of the road proposed to be constructed. The purchase of this road would have one great advantage—by a single summer's work it could be extended to the Matanuska coal fields.

In addition, the bill carries general provisions for the condemnation of any lands or property which may have passed from the United States into private ownership, and also for the issuance of bonds to provide funds for the construction of the road. My purpose in providing these bonds was to make this road distinctly a people's proposition. I believe these bonds would provide a safe and sure investment for the people of the United States and should be distributed as widely as possible.

One of the great difficulties in this country which has led to socially unwise and politically uneconomic practice of depositing money in the banks has been the lack of safe and conservative investment securities. It is not intended by these bonds to provide additional securities to be used as a basis for currency, but it is intended to provide a bond for the investment of the funds of those who are least capable of choosing securities for the investment of their savings. To my mind this is a very important feature of the bill, and while I should not want to insist upon its provisions to the extent of delaying the immediate construction of a road, the present opportunity seems to me an appropriate one for entering upon a policy which will afford a permanent and safe investment backed by the Government. Thus we will make the people the partners, both in the prosperity which the railroad will bring to Alaska and in the profits of the railroad itself.

I would not want the committee to get the idea that the opening of the Matanuska coal fields presents the only reason for the construction of a railroad in Alaska by the National Government. The opening of these fields would be but an incident in the development of Alaska. It is true that it would properly be one of the first incidents because of the necessity for coal in operating the railroad itself, but I doubt very much that the present state of the coal market on the western coast would warrant the building of this railroad for the purpose alone of opening up these coal fields.

To me the development of Alaska means not only the opening up of the coal mines and development of the other resources of the Territory, but a symmetrical development of agriculture, mining, and allied industries such as would make the Territory as far as possible self-sustaining.

For some reason or other Alaska seems to have been regarded as a mysterious land where a nigger was to be found in every woodpile and a woodchuck in every bush. There is some reason for this feeling, but it ought not to constitute an argument against a safe and sane development of the whole Territory according to modern ideas of conservation.

One argument which has been advanced against the building and operating of a railroad in Alaska by the National Government is that it might offer a precedent for Government ownership in the States. This is indeed reaching the reductio ad absurdum. The construction and operation of a railroad in Alaska would warrant the adoption of that principle of Government ownership in the State and would form a precedent for such ownership only in the event that the construction and operation of the railroad in Alaska proved to be a success and in the interest of the whole people. Certainly in this event the experiment would not constitute any argument against Government ownership. The experiment itself could under no theory be injurious to Alaska. There is every reason to believe that the result of the experiment would be exactly the opposite.

Of course, if we are not in earnest in developing Alaska for the benefit of all the people, if we are not in earnest in our desire to prevent the control of the natural resources of Alaska by a few, there is no reason why the Government should build a railroad as an incident to its development.

If we are willing to turn over, without restriction, the resources of Alaska to the exploitation of those who have money enough to make the gamble, doubtless those who are to possess the land would be willing to provide adequate facilities for transporting its resources to market, for the same reason that the Steel Trust, controlling the larger part of the iron mines of the country, finds it expedient to own the railroads which transport the ore to their mills. Most of us agree, however, that it is not a good, economical policy to permit the ownership of transportation facilities by corporations principally engaged in the development of other industries.

We have an opportunity here to develop Alaska along modern lines of conservation—along lines which will permit of symmetrical development in an economic and self-sustaining way. Development will follow the establishment of this railroad as assuredly as it followed the construction of the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern lines to the coast.

There seems to be some sentiment in favor of submitting the whole question of location and survey of a railroad right of way to a commission whose powers are limited to the survey and location of the right of way itself. Doubtless the purpose of establishing such a commission is to set at rest the bitter controversy which has been waged by the advocates of one location or another over the location of the railroad. In my judgment the opinion of such a commission would not set at rest this controversy. A commission to investigate the resources of Alaska was appointed some years ago. The commission made an investigation on the ground. One of the members of that commission has now a bill before the Committee on Territories providing for the construction of a railroad from Seward to the Tanana and Yukon, with a branch to the Matanuska coal fields, practically as provided in the bill which I introduced.

The Secretary of the Interior has made an investigation of the matter, and his utterances upon the subject of the proper location of a railroad do not seem to indicate any doubt in his mind of where it should be located. Mr. Gifford Pinchot was in Alaska at about the same time, and there has been no intimation from him that the road should be located in any other place than that suggested by Mr. Fisher. So far as the appropriate place for the location of the road is concerned, I think we are in possession of information upon which to settle that question now. Any evidence which could be obtained by a commission appointed for that purpose, or any decision which they could make, I am sure would only add in a cumulative way to the judgment of those who have already been on the ground.

Briefly stated, my idea of the law necessary for the construction of this railroad embodies in as few words as possible a direction to the President to appoint a commission. This commission should be directed at once to proceed to the survey of a right of way and the construction of a railway upon it from Resurrection Bay to the Tanana and Yukon region, with a branch to the Matanuska coal fields. It should have ample power and funds, and discretion to proceed to the location and construction of the railroad at once.

I do not think it is wise to hamper the commission with many restrictions, for these only increase its difficulties and labors.

The Late Representative John G. McHenry.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. CURTIS H. GREGG,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 16, 1913,

On House resolution 842, paying tribute to the memory of Hon. JOHN G. MCHENRY, late a Member of the House from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, among the many deaths which have occurred in the Sixty-second Congress none brought greater sorrow to me personally than that of JOHN G. MCHENRY. The death of any human being is always attended with sadness. We are all aware that sooner or later the grim messenger will knock at the door of everyone of us. Yet, notwithstanding this fact, notwithstanding it is declared that "it is appointed unto man once to die," yet with each recurring death our hearts are touched with sorrow. So when the light in the life of JOHN MCHENRY went out there came sorrow and sadness which was not confined only to his own household but that which reached out to a great constituency and throughout the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

My personal acquaintance with my colleague extended over a period of less than two years; but during that time this acquaintanceship ripened into a genuine friendship. Therefore I consider the death of Mr. MCHENRY a personal loss. Soon after I was elected I received a personal letter from him, not only congratulating me upon the result of the election, but giving me sage advice and offering me assistance in the discharge of my duties. The advice was accepted cheerfully and he extended the aid. When I came here, in April, 1911, I found him ready and willing to help me on all occasions.

He was one of the fairest minded men whom I have ever met. He was just, and he believed that all his fellows possessed the same virtue. Therefore he had all the honest, just men in his district with him at all times.

He was generous. He knew that all men were human and liable to err. Therefore, when he discovered that no willful error or mistake was made, he was willing to accept the excuse.

He was honest. He did what he thought was right and then clung to it. As I have said, he believed in humanity, and thus believing, he trusted in his fellows.

Moreover, he was a gentleman. He was kind and considerate. He was at all times modest and retiring, yet he remembered the dignity of his position in life. He belonged to that old-fashioned, honest class of gentlemen that is fast disappearing. The world needs more of them—the ones who meet one with the glad handclasp and the cheery good morning.

Such was JOHN MCHENRY. Long will he live in the memory of his associates, and longer will he live in the thoughts and lives and hearts of his constituency.

What more can I say than that—

> His life was gentle, and the elements
> So mix'd in him, that Nature might stand up
> And say to all the world, "This was a man."

The Problem of the Mississippi River.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BENJAMIN G. HUMPHREYS,
OF MISSISSIPPI,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Wednesday, February 19, 1913,

On the bill (H. R. 28775) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an editorial from the Scientific American on the subject of the problem of the Mississippi. Since the digging of the Panama Canal this is the most serious and the most important problem which Congress will have to deal with. All three of the political parties represented on this floor are committed by specific declarations in their several platforms to the task of preventing floods on the Mississippi River, and I commend unreservedly to their careful consideration this editorial, which states the problem and the sole method of its solution more pointedly and concisely than I have ever seen it stated before.

Every man here will concede that the Scientific American is one of the most conservative, accurate, and well-advised journals on all technical subjects published in this country, and its conclusions on this particular problem will certainly carry weight, if not conviction, to every open mind. Few gentlemen here have the time which is necessary to devote to the study of the Mississippi River, and I hope, therefore, that you will read this editorial, which will cover less than two pages in the RECORD, and yet which covers the whole subject.

Reservoirs, outlets, and other kindred theories are studied and their fallacies exposed, and the levee theory, which all who are informed on the subject agree is the only feasible way to control the floods, is fully indorsed. I do hope that every Member here will read this editorial, because it illumines a subject that we will soon be called upon to consider and finally settle.

[Scientific American, Feb. 15, 1913.]

THE PROBLEM OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The great flood of the Mississippi River of last year—the largest in recorded history—when the levees were overtopped or carried away bodily, and vast areas of the valley were inundated, has created a doubt in the minds of the public as to whether the method of control by revetment and construction of levees was not a failure. This doubt has been freely expressed in the many letters which have been published, during the past year, in the columns of the Scientific American. We have made no comment upon these letters, many of which suggested alternative and supposedly better plans for the control of the river, and our silence has been due to the fact that we were making a study of the problem from every possible source of information, with a view to determining for ourselves whether the present plans for the control of the river, or some other, were the best to apply in grappling with and controlling this stupendous problem.

We have come to the conclusion that the present plan of the Army Engineers of protecting the banks of the river by revetment and raising the banks by artificial levees to a sufficient height to prevent overflow is not only the best way to control the river but the only way.

If it be asked whether the disastrous inundation of last year does not spell failure, we answer, emphatically, no. The inundation occurred, not because the plan was faulty, but because it was incomplete. It was also due to the fact that the existing levees were built only to a sufficient elevation to control the highest flood on record, which the flood of last year greatly exceeded—the maximum flow reaching the enormous total of 2,300,000,000 feet per second, or twelve times the amount of water that passes over Niagara Falls.

The trouble with the Mississippi work is not that the plans are wrong, but that they have been carried out piecemeal and in a somewhat happy-go-lucky manner. The Nation should apply to this great work the lesson which it has learned at Panama. A new grade line for the summit of the levees should be established, said line being well above the height reached by the flood of last year; a liberal estimate should be made of the total cost of building these levees, and of protecting the adjacent banks of the river throughout the whole length of the levees with revetments; an estimate should be made of the largest annual appropriation of money that could be efficiently expended by the largest force that could be concentrated upon the work; and finally the execution of the work should be placed entirely in the hands of the Army Engineers with a Col. Goethals in supreme and unhampered control.

Such an estimate of the total cost of a completely leveed and revetted Mississippi River has been made by the Army Engineers under the Mississippi River Commission. The total expenditure would be about $70,000,000 for the levee work and about $90,000,000 for the revetment.

Is complete control of the Mississippi River and the absolute prevention of disastrous floods worth the expenditure of $160,000,000? The Scientific American is decidedly of the opinion that the money would be well spent. In the first place the completion of this work would afford protection to 29,000 square miles of land. The increased value of the land, due to protection, is shown by a statement of Col. Townsend, president of the Mississippi River Commission, who has recently testified before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the House of Representatives that 20 years ago, when he was first stationed in the St. Francis Basin, land in that vicinity could be bought for a dollar or two an acre, whereas to-day it is worth anywhere from $20 to $50 and even $100 an acre. Furthermore, there is the humanitarian consideration that this work would prevent the great loss of life and destruction of property which occurs when the river breaks loose. And finally there is the consideration that the completion of this task will constitute a great national work of engineering comparable, in its magnitude and beneficent results, with the execution of the Panama Canal.

We will now proceed to discuss the criticisms of the present plan and the suggestions of alternative schemes of control, which have been made in the many letters referred to above. It has been stated that the whole principle of levee building is wrong; and this for the reason that the matter brought down in suspension is deposited along the bed of the river, which is continually being raised, that this necessitates a raising of the levees, which must go on indefinitely. As a matter of fact, what takes place is this: When the floods come down, the deep pools are scoured out and the material is deposited on the shoals farther down the river, causing a temporary raising of the bottom at these points. As the river falls, the action is reversed, the bars are scoured out and the sand is deposited in the next pool. Careful surveys for several decades show that not only has there been no raising of the river bed but the cross section of the river has slightly increased.

As to the proposal to control the Mississippi by building vast reservoirs near the headwaters of the river and its tributaries, it may be said at once that the magnitude and cost of such reservoirs and the enormous areas of land that would have to be condemned render such a scheme impracticable. Its advocates have failed to realize the stupendous magnitude of a problem which involves the control of flood waters that sweep down the Mississippi River at the rate of 2,300,000,000 cubic feet per second. Testifying on the point, Col. Townsend said before the House committee:

> If you were to destroy the whole State of Minnesota—that is, stop every bit of water flowing over it—it would not have made a difference of three-tenths of a foot in the height of the last flood at Cairo.

Again, if, as has been suggested, the St. Francis Basin were converted into a storage reservoir, and the floods were thereby reduced 3 or 4 feet in height, it would be necessary to sacrifice no less than 7,000 square miles of country, or the area of a good-sized State.

Another favorite scheme contemplates the diversion of the Mississippi, or of a large portion of its flood waters, by means of subchannels or "canals" excavated on one side or the other of the river. This suggestion also fails to appreciate the magnitude of the problem. If such channels were to be cut, they would have to be leveed in exactly the same way as the river which they were intended to relieve. To produce any serious diminution in the height of a river that was passing down 2,300,000,000 cubic feet of water per second, it would be necessary to divert from 400,000 to 600,000 feet per second, which means that an artificial river would have to be excavated and leveed whose flow would be from two to three times as great as the whole flow of the Niagara River.

The proposition to straighten out the river by cutting through the bends is impracticable, for the reason that while the more rapid flow would relieve the flood in the districts thus affected, this relief would be obtained at the expense of the districts lower down the river. The swifter current of the flood water, due to the shorter course, would necessitate a corresponding increase in the height of the levees in the lower sections of the valley.

As to the important question of financing the work, the simplest and most effective plan, of course, would be to do with regard to the Mississippi as we have done at Panama—make it a national problem and provide the whole cost from the National Treasury. Hitherto the Government has put up so much money; so much has been contributed by the local levee boards; and in one case at least the State has made appropriations. It is not surprising to learn that Col. Townsend designates such conditions as amounting to practically "an absence of system." Says he—

We have just simply been waiting, each one doing the best he could—the levee boards have been doing their work, and the district engineers have been doing whatever they could with their funds, and it has been a happy-go-lucky method of business.

We believe that the most satisfactory way of financing the project would be for Congress to treat the improvement of America's greatest river as a national undertaking, make the necessary appropriations, abolish the system of individual boards, and place the execution of the work under the one-man control of the Army. Next to this the best plan would be one of joint Federal and State appropriations in proportions to be determined by the local advantages secured, with the physical design and execution of the work intrusted to the Corps of Engineers of the Army working under the absolute control of an Army officer of proved executive ability.

In another year the Panama Canal will be completed. Why not move Col. Goethals with his admirable staff and perfectly working system from the Isthmus of Panama to the Mississippi Valley?

OF

HON. J. HAMPTON MOORE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 17, 1913,

On the bill (H. R. 28766) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to vote against this bill, but I do oppose its consideration under suspension of the rules, and think it ought not to be so considered. The bill carries appropriations amounting to over $25,000,000, and is so cleverly made up as to easily satisfy a majority of the Members that it ought to pass. Concerning it we are told that it provides appropriations for enough towns and villages in the various congressional districts to thoroughly control the situation in the House, and suspension of the rules is resorted to because the reading of the bill, paragraph by paragraph, might lead to inquiries as to the propriety of certain items, and thus delay the passage of the measure. At any rate, consideration under suspension prevents amendments of any kind, and to this method of passing the bill I am opposed.

Why should we not have an opportunity to discuss and amend a bill carrying appropriations amounting to $25,000,000 and over? Gentlemen on the committee blandly tell us we can have another chance two years hence. And this without respect to whether items in the bill will stand the test of criticism in the House or whether items that have been omitted from the bill are wholly meritorious.

SUSPENSION CARRIES THE BILL.

The bill was not reported until Saturday, and to-day it is brought in under suspension to be disposed of in 40 minutes. We are told to take the 58 pages of authorizations just as they are written and be content. This sounds good to the great majority who have been taken care of in the bill. Where does it leave the more important projects that the committee has not considered favorably? In looking over the bill I am frank to say I have found no one of the hundreds of items that present greater merit than the Philadelphia customhouse project, and yet it is totally ignored. The limit of cost for existing projects all over the country is increased over $2,300,000; enlargements and extensions are allowed to upward of $1,400,000; new buildings are authorized to the extent of more than $8,420,000; new buildings and sites—and these are all in advance of necessities—are allowed for more than $9,000,000; and new sites alone are allowed to the extent of $1,304,000, in addition to $3,000,000 miscellaneous; but the Philadelphia customhouse has again been laid aside.

A CROWDED CUSTOMHOUSE.

Mr. Speaker, we have been using the old customhouse at Philadelphia without material change for 70 years. Since the Government took possession of it after the famous controversy between Andrew Jackson and Nicholas Biddle it has proven one of the best-paying investments we have ever had.

In the last 70 years the business of the port of Philadelphia has vastly increased, and each year it has grown more and more cramped in the narrow confines of the substantial and historic old structure. In 1912, owing to the pressure for room to decently transact the public business, the collecting force, which received and accounted for $21,000,000 at the port of Philadelphia, was restricted to one small room, which had formerly done service as a lavatory.

PORT EARNS ITS WAY.

Gentlemen who are taking $25,000,000 into their various districts for public buildings and for sites for buildings they expect to get into this bill two years hence, have no right to find fault with those who oppose suspension of the rules, by which even the presentation of these facts is made impossible. We want a new customhouse at Philadelphia. We have been waiting a long while for it. The facts have been presented to the committee, but we are cut out of the bill and then told to hold our peace here and not even discuss the merits of our claims.

This is not a square deal to a port which collects in one year almost as much as is apportioned to the whole country in this bill. A big city like Philadelphia, which is progressive and does a large business, ought not to be punished merely because there are more votes from the country districts than from the cities. We should be treated fairly, according to our population and commercial importance, and by this standard we are willing to be judged. Evidently the committee was scared away from the Philadelphia customhouse project because $1,000,000 was asked to procure a site and start a building. True a million dollars at this time would cover a multitude of towns and hamlets where ultimate business is hoped for, but meanwhile what of the city of 1,500,000 inhabitants, where business is already established, and in this particular instance overcrowded? The committee, which under suspension is supreme in this instance, has answered that question against Philadelphia. In order to show what the failure to consider the customhouse proposition means to the Federal Government at Philadelphia, I append memoranda which I desire to have of record for future reference:

HISTORY.

The present customhouse building on Chesnut Street, below Fifth, extending to Sansom Street, was erected in 1821 at a cost of $413,081 by and for the use of the United States Bank. It was purchased by the Government in 1841 for $225,000, and was used for customs purposes exclusively until 1867, in which year the United States subtreasury was moved into the building and has since occupied the entire rear, or Sansom Street end, comprising an area of 87 by 54 feet. This includes offices, record rooms, vaults, and stairways, and is practically one-third of the entire building.

RECEIPTS.

The receipts of the office for 1912 were $21,494,085.55, of which $4,500,000 represented the duties on sugar. In 1903 the receipts were $20,728,676.95, of which $9,000,000 was for duties on sugar. The difference in the amount of duties collected on sugar is accounted for in the fact that in recent years free sugar from the Hawaiian Islands has been brought to this port in large quantities via railroad across the Tehuantepec Peninsula from Salina Cruz to Puerto, Mexico, and has taken the place of dutiable sugars formerly imported. The receipt of these sugars has increased the volume of business, but not the value of imports or the cash receipts, and these shipments do not appear in the port's statistics for the reason that Hawaii is now a portion of the United States and shipments therefrom are treated as domestic merchandise. This sugar, if dutiable, would have added $9,000,000 to the duties received during 1912.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

The total value of the imports for 1912 is $92,566,087, and for 1903, $55,516,052. The value of the exports for 1912 is $72,837,717, and for 1903, $73,184,394.

ENTRIES.

Entries and their accompanying invoices are the basis of the largest portion of the work of the customhouse in connection with importations, and the number of entries is therefore the best barometer by which to gauge the work of any customhouse. The number of entries received and acted upon at this port during the year 1912 was 75,921; for the year 1903 the total number was 42,912; an increase of over 33,000.

STEAMSHIP LINES.

There are 38 regular steamship lines plying between this port and foreign ports. When the present customhouse was first occupied there were no regular lines and no steamships, but only an occasional sailing vessel bringing foreign merchandise to the port.

PASSENGERS AND TONNAGE.

In the year 1912, 61,163 passengers arrived at this port; in 1903 the total number arriving was 32,567; an increase of over 28,000.

In the year 1912 the total tonnage of vessels arriving at this port from foreign ports was 2,863,028; in 1903 the total tonnage was 1,866,391; an increase of over 1,000,000 tons in carrying capacity.

DUTIABLE MERCHANDISE WEIGHED.

During the year 1912, 1,810,490 tons of dutiable merchandise were weighed at this port; in 1903, 1,466,696 tons were weighed; an increase of about 344,000 tons.

COST OF COLLECTING A DOLLAR.

The cost of collecting $1 at this port is $0.029. The cost at the other large ports is as follows: New York, $0.022; Boston, $0.035; San Francisco, $0.072; New Orleans, $0.040; Baltimore, $0.070.

MORE ROOM NEEDED FOR COLLECTOR.

The collector's room is large enough, but the room adjoining, which should be used by him as a waiting or ante room, and was formerly so used, is divided into two offices, and occupied by his private secretary and stenographer and the special deputy collector. This was rendered necessary because the room formerly occupied by the special deputy had to be given up in order to relieve a congested condition in the main room.

Persons waiting to see the collector must stand or, if there be room enough, sit on a bench in the corridor.

ALSO FOR THE SPECIAL DEPUTY.

The special deputy's present office is too small to contain the necessary furniture, such as bookcases, filing cases, office safe, and so forth. Books of reference and other documents that should be in this room are relegated to remote parts of the building for want of room. There is no waiting room to this office save the corridor.

SECRETARY AND STENOGRAPHER.

This office is nearly filled with absolutely necessary furniture, and the accommodations for persons having business to transact therein are ridiculously inadequate.

Neither this office nor the office of the special deputy—which are practically in one room—is properly lighted. Not a single ray of direct sunshine ever finds its way into either office.

MAIN BUSINESS ROOM CRAMPED.

In this office every available spot is being utilized, even to the extent of building filing cases under the windows and wardrobes in the corridors. Everything is crowded, and the working force is seriously incommoded. Additional filing cases and desks are badly needed, in fact, have been ordered by direction of the department, but there is no place to put them. The work of the office is increasing every year, and it is even now necessary to increase the force, but no room can be found for additional employees The bulk of the correspondence is prepared in this office under great difficulties. There should be a special room for this work.

AUDITING AND STATISTICAL DEPARTMENTS.

These departments are confined to what is practically one room. This room is overcrowded, and the facilities for doing business are very unsatisfactory.

THE CASHIER CROWDED.

In the effort to secure more space for general business the toilet room was moved into the basement and the vacated space fitted up as a cashier's office. It is too small, too close and hot, and too generally unfit for the purpose to be satisfactory. The size of this room is 19 by 11 feet. The space occupied by furniture, which consists of three desks, a large counter, wardrobe, safe, chairs, and so forth, reduces the working space for a force of three men to a decidedly uncomfortable limit.

THE NAVAL OFFICE.

The naval officer, his deputy, and 13 employees are crowded into two rooms. The space is entirely inadequate for the work of the office, and much inconvenience is experienced.

THE SURVEYOR'S QUARTERS.

The surveyor, his special deputy, and 11 employees occupy two rooms on the second floor, neither of them large. They are overcrowded, and the work is consequently impeded.

THE FILING OF RECORDS.

The files rooms in the loft of the building are inadequate for the purpose and not at all adapted to modern needs. Owing to want of room, it is necessary, at stated periods, to inclose in packing cases valuable records and send them for storage in the appraiser's stores building. This makes it very inconvenient when it becomes necessary, as it frequently does, to examine these records for statistical purposes.

LACKS AN ELEVATOR.

The absence of an elevator in that portion of the building used for customs purposes is a source of great inconvenience, not only to the officials and employees, but to all persons having customs business to transact, and is the subject of frequent comment and complaint. To enter the building on the main business floor it is necessary to ascend a flight of 20 steps, and to reach the second floor a further climb of 35 steps is required. To ladies and persons advanced in years, many of whom have business transactions with the customhouse, this is a great hardship.

In short, the building is archaic, incommodious, and not at all adapted to the present needs of the service.

APPRAISER'S STORES FULL.

Apart from the customhouse, the appraiser's stores at Philadelphia are also needing enlargement. Provision for this business ought also to be recognized, but the committee has not seen fit to do so.

The United States appraiser's stores building, on Second Street between Chestnut and Walnut Streets, was finished and occupied in the latter part of 1871. It is 73 feet 2 inches wide and 248 feet 8 inches in depth, occupying the lot bounded by Second, American, Sansom, and Moravian Streets. Inspectors from the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury have examined the building and pronounced the foundations and walls sufficiently strong to support three additional stories, which are urgently needed for the proper dispatch of current business.

More room is needed for storing seized goods, samples, examination packages, and unclaimed merchandise. As a matter of fact, there is no room in this building for the storage of goods taken possession of by the Government as unclaimed, and it is necessary to arrange with outside warehouses for the storage of this class of merchandise.

GREAT INCREASE OF WORK.

More room and better light for examination of merchandise. The number of packages to be examined has increased from 47,220 in 1896 to 81,705 in 1912. Artificial light is being used almost exclusively in this work. Natural light could be obtained by increasing the height of the building and having the examinations made on the higher floors.

The representatives of the pure food and drugs department, under the Secretary of Agriculture, are located in this building and require more room, as the work of this department has largely increased in the past three years and is still growing, and the two rooms on the fourth floor now in use are inadequate. At least double the space now occupied is needed.

A large room and one room adjoining are needed for the use of the Board of General Appraisers when holding hearings in this city. At present these hearings are held in the office of the special agent, but the necessity for more commodious, better adapted, and more private quarters is obvious.

More room for deputy surveyor and inspectors, for the weigher and his assistants will soon be absolutely necessary, and there is a great demand for better facilities for receiving and delivering packages of merchandise sent up for examination.

STEMMING THE TIDE OF PROGRESS.

Mr. Speaker, it seems like stemming the tide of progress to hold up these great improvements when so much depends upon them. During the last 10 years, in spite of the fact that channel improvements have been delayed on the Delaware River, we have collected at the port of Philadelphia approximately $200,000,000, enough to have provided for eight public buildings bills with separate appropriations for almost every congressional district from the Atlantic to the Pacific and the Lakes to the Gulf. While every other section of the country has participated in this enormous 10 years' revenue we have been receiving scant consideration for the port of Philadelphia. It was like cutting teeth to obtain the authorization for a 35-foot channel; it was grudgingly allowed, and yet in one year the port contributes to the country twice as much money as would be necessary to complete the entire channel project which when completed will doubtless double the national revenues. After a hard fight and much persuasion we were given a new immigration station. It is already more than paying for itself in increased business. Now we tell you we are crowded out of the customhouse in which we are collecting enormous revenues for the country, and you tell us you must have the money for "the four corners of the earth," leaving us to come along in the dim hereafter.

There must be a basis for the collection of revenue or the hundreds of projects provided for in this bill must go by the board. In the port of Philadelphia we have a revenue-producing center which ordinary business judgment would encourage. Unless we do afford proper facilities for the transaction of our customs business and give decent encouragement to those who are engaged in this service it would seem from the viewpoint of the proponents of the present bill that in order to get money for projects in various parts of the country we are to totally disregard the source of supply.

When we get better facilities at the great port of Philadelphia we will produce more revenue for the rest of the country. Why, therefore, must the national business be delayed or hampered at this port?

A Government of Laws with an Independent Judiciary.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. EDWARD L. TAYLOR, JR.,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 20, 1913.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me I print as a part of my remarks the address of Hon. Jesse Baker Root, of Butte, Mont., before the Washington State Board Association.

The address is as follows:

A GOVERNMENT OF LAWS WITH AN INDEPENDENT JUDICIARY.

Protection is the purpose of government. Government is defined to be "the exercise of authority in the administration of the affairs of a State, community, or society; the authoritative direction and restraint exercised over the actions of men in communities, societies, or States." It is a State or body politic governed by one authority. Hamilton, in the Federalist, asks and answers the question, "Why has government been instituted at all?" His answer to this question is, "Because the passions of men will not conform to the dictates of reason and justice without constraint." Obedience to law is essential to the existence of government. Stability, morality, and respectability are essential qualities of the laws of a government. Certainty of law is essential to its stability. "Where the law is uncertain there is no law" is one of the maxims of our jurisprudence, the origin of which is lost in the dim mists of the past. The value of jurisprudence depends on a fixed and uniform rule of action. Herein lies the value of precedent. If bread would one day sustain and the next destroy life, its value would be destroyed. It is another of our maxims that when the law fails to serve as a rule almost everything ought to be suspected. Another of the ancient maxims of our jurisprudence is this: "It is a miserable state of things when the law is vague and uncertain." And, again, law that is deficient is better than law that is uncertain, for things that are uncertain are held as nothing.

To define wrongs and provide remedies should be the first concern of government. This is evidenced by preambles to great State papers. A wrong that is once set in motion returns, like the boomerang, to the thrower. And so it is with unstable governments. Wherever the maxims of natural justice—and this is another way of saying the maxims of our jurisprudence—are respected there will be found a government of protection; otherwise it is one of spoliation and oppression. In every government of stability and protection will be found laws that are certain and fixed rules of official action.

Thus far I have only stated a few general principles, with which every lawyer is familiar. I have mentioned these general principles for the purpose of making them the basis—the text, so to speak—of my remarks.

And here I must say, by way of preface, that I shall discuss these general principles—from which I shall deduce my subject, A Government of Laws with an Independent Judiciary, in the light of the present-day agitation among the people of the United States. I have come to speak to you, however, from the standpoint or the viewpoint of a lawyer and not from that of a politician. I would be doing violence to my sense of propriety if I were intentionally to say anything to wound anyone who does me the honor to give me his attention. I can not believe that anything that I will say can in any way offend any lawyer who prefers his profession to the vocation of politics. The things I shall say, I am persuaded to believe, concern vitally every member of our profession. I have no thought of awakening any political animosities. It may be that not all of you will agree with what I shall say, and that some of you may think, when I shall have concluded, that I have entered the domain of politics, an unseemly thing to do on an occasion like the present. But if there be any present who shall hold such views, pray remember that the matters I shall discuss concern patriots, and especially the members of the profession of law. The questions that naturally come within my subject are questions that every lawyer should meet with courage and firmness. I pray that you will accept my assurance that all that I shall say will be said in kindness and with the single purpose of awakening in your minds thoughts that should engage every lawyer who loves his profession and his country.

I will now enter upon the discharge of the agreeable duty that I have, at your courteous invitation, undertaken. In doing so I bespeak your patience and your sympathy.

An exhaustive development of a subject of such far-reaching importance as that I have chosen in the brief time necessarily imposed by the unavoidable limitations of this occasion is to me manifestly hopeless. I shall endeavor, however, to treat some matters within the scope of my subject in a way that I hope will furnish food for reflection.

You must have perceived already, Mr. President, that I favor a government of laws, and that I am opposed to what is called, in that lately coined phrase, the recall of judicial decisions. I am also opposed to the recall of judges and to any other interference with our judiciary, except the removal of judges who are either corrupt or wanting in that courage and firmness that should characterize every judicial officer. Indeed, without an independent judiciary ours would not be, in a full and proper sense, a government of laws. I shall endeavor, as I go along, to make this manifest.

Courage is as much required in a judge as religion in a priest or minister of the gospel—courage to declare the laws correctly, regardless of conditions or environments. This courage is required to insure that uniform application of the law that makes it the same under all circumstances, and hence to insure certainty in the administration of justice. Permit me to attract your attention here to the memorable words of the great Chief Justice, John Marshall, on the occasion of the trial of Aaron Burr. But first let me draw your attention to the circumstances under which the words I am about to quote were used. I can best do this in the language of William Henry Rawle, Esq., who delivered the oration at the unveiling of the statue of Chief Justice Marshall at Washington, May 10, 1884.

"The story of Aaron Burr," says Mr. Rawle, "with all its reality and all its romance, must always, in spite of much that is repugnant, fascinate both young and old. When, in a phase of his varied life, he who had been noted, if not famous, as a soldier, as a lawyer, as an orator, who had won the reason of men and charmed the hearts of women, who had held the high office of Vice President of the United States, and whose hands were red with the blood of Hamilton—when he found himself on trial for his life upon the charge of high treason, before a judge who was Hamilton's dear friend, and a jury chosen with difficulty from an excited people, what wonder that, like Cain, he felt himself singled out from his fellows and, coming between his counsel and the court, exclaimed: 'Would to God that I did stand on the same ground with any other man.' And yet the impartiality which marked the conduct of those trials was never excelled in history. By the law of our mother country to have only compassed and imagined the Government's subversion was treason; but, according to our Constitution, 'treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort'; and can it be, said Marshall, that the landing of a few men, however desperate and however intent to overthrow the government of a State, was a levying of war? It might be a conspiracy, but it was not treason within the Constitution, and Burr's accomplices were discharged of their high crime. And upon his own memorable trial—that strange scene in which these men, the prisoner and the judge, each so striking in appearance, were confronted, and as people said, 'two such pairs of eyes had never looked into one another before'—upon that trial the scales of justice were held with absolutely even hand. No greater display of judicial skill and judicial rectitude was ever witnessed. No more effective dignity ever added weight to judicial language. Outside the court and through the country it was cried that 'the people of America demanded a conviction'; and within it all the pressure which counsel dared to borrow was exerted to this end. It could hardly be passed by. 'That this court dares not usurp power is most true,' began the last lines of Marshall's charge to the jury. 'That this court dare not shrink from its duty is not less true. No man is desirous of becoming the peculiar subject of calumny. No man, might he let the bitter cup pass from him without self-reproach, would drain it to the bottom. But if he has no choice in the case, if there is no alternative presented to him but a dereliction of duty or the opprobrium of those who are denominated the world, he merits the contempt as well as the indignation of his country who can hesitate which to embrace.' That counsel should, he said, be impatient at any deliberation of the court, and suspect or fear the operation of motives to which alone they could ascribe that deliberation, was perhaps a frailty incident to human nature, 'but if any conduct could warrant a sentiment that it would deviate to one side or to the other from the line prescribed by duty and by law, that conduct would be viewed by the judges themselves with an eye of extreme severity and would long be recollected with deep and serious regrets.'

"The result was acquittal, and, as was said by the angry counsel for the Government, 'Marshall has stepped in between Burr and death.' Though the disappointment was extreme, though started from the level of excited popular feeling, it made its way upward till it reached the dignity of grave dissatisfaction expressed in a President's message to Congress, though the trial led to legislative alteration of the law, the judge was unmoved by criticism, no matter from what quarter, and was content to await the judgment of posterity. Never in all the dark history of State trials was the law, as then it stood and bound both parties, ever interpreted with more impartiality to the accuser and the accused."

Had the recall been in vogue at the time of Burr's trial John Marshall would have been recalled, and what a loss it would have been to the American people few can estimate. Our Government of laws would have long since disappeared had it not been for the Constitution and its great expounder, John Marshall, unless another Marshall had saved the Constitution. Congress would long ago have set aside the Constitution, and in the place of a constitutional Government would have substituted one of men.

The case of Burr illustrates more forcibly than any other that I can call to mind at this time the wisdom of and the security in a Government of laws. If ours were a Government of men instead of a Government of laws, the inhibition against ex post facto laws would be brushed aside by the momentary passions of the people and a law would be made for each particular case, and it would be framed to suit the excited passions of the people. In other words, anarchy or chaos, which is another word for anarchy, would reign. No man would be safe. Life, property, reputation would be at the mercy of the clamoring, unreasoning mob.

Here, Mr. President, I am constrained to remark that legislatures are sometimes as wanting in reason as is an excited public. History furnishes many instances in proof of this. More often, though, for want of courage to do the right and wise thing, legislatures unwisely yield to the pressure of the storms of party rage or popular caprice. The judgment of posterity always condemns such acts by legislatures.

The judiciary should be free from all interference by the legislature. There are several ways in which legislatures have been wont to coerce the judiciary. The distinction between legislative and judicial functions is that the former is to make the law for future cases and that the latter is to declare it as to cases which have already occurred. It is one of the fundamental principles of our Constitution, and an important ingredient of a free government, that the legislative and judicial powers shall be kept distinct and separate. Likewise it is fundamental under our Government that the power of making general laws for future cases shall never be placed in the same hands with that of declaring and applying it to particular and present cases. The union of these two powers in the same hands constitutes the worst of despotisms. The peculiar and distinguishing characteristic of despotism is that a man may be punished for an act which, when he did it, was not forbidden by law; while, on the other hand, it is the essence of freedom that no act can be treated as a crime unless there was a precise law forbidding it at the time it was committed. If a man is to be thus condemned, then, indeed, we have the form of a free government, but the substance of despotism.

Before such a rule is established let it be remembered that it is a two-edged sword. Let those who contemplate the making of such a despotic rule remember that power must often change hands in a popular government; that after every political struggle the victorious party comes into power with resentments to gratify by the destruction of their defeated opponents. Let them remember that precedents by which actions innocent when done may be converted into crimes are the most convenient and effectual instruments of revenge and destruction with which a victorious party can be furnished. Let them beware how they give their approval to principles which may soon be turned against themselves; how they forge bolts which may soon be hurled against their own heads. In a popular government such as ours, where power is fluctuating, where constitutional principles are therefore so important for the protection of the weaker party against the stronger, it above all things behooves the party in power to adhere to the principles of justice, lest by departing from them they furnish the provocation and the weapon for their own destruction.

I have said that there are several ways in which legislatures coerce the judges of our courts. One way is by the misuse of the law of impeachment. Here I must be permitted to digress long enough to state that what I shall say on the subject of impeachment will have no reference whatever to the recent case that so much agitated the minds of the people living in that part of your State lying west of yonder beautiful and majestic range of mountains. If my remarks on this subject shall associate themselves in your minds with that case, it will be a mere coincidence. I have no knowledge whatever of the facts in that case further than that I gleaned from the public press, which is not always reliable. Allow me to say, however, that the impression I gained from reading the newspapers was that the case was brought on because the learned judge gave a judgment in a suit in equity brought by the United States to cancel the citizenship papers of a man, which judgment was the only one which an honest judge could have given under the circumstances. I must be permitted to say that I admire his courage and his fidelity to his duty in that case.

But, to resume, I want to make it clear that I find no fault with, and no criticism of, the provision in our Federal and State constitutions for the impeachment of judges and other officers. It is the misuse of this law that I find myself unable to approve. What is the popular conception of this constitutional provision? Why, sir, it is that an officer may be impeached for anything that he may do that happens to be unpopular at the time. Forsooth, for playing chess on Saturday afternoon, if that innocent pastime fails to obtain the approbation of the majority of the people. And Members of Congress or of the State legislature, to gain the approbation of their constituents and make themselves popular, are willing to bring on a bill of impeachment. They are, in most cases, either without judicial minds or venal.

What is the constitutional description of those official acts for which a public officer may be arraigned before the High Court of Impeachment? In the Federal Constitution it is declared that the officers there named shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. If a judge is guilty of treason or bribery or any high crime or high misdemeanor, he should be impeached and convicted, and in this manner removed from office, but not for any act that does not fall within the definition of high crime or high misdemeanor. "Crime" and "misdemeanor" are technical terms, well understood among lawyers and defined in law.

Does not the court provided by the Constitution for the trial of impeachment give us some idea of the grade of the offenses intended for its jurisdiction? Under the Federal Constitution it is the Senate of the United States that constitutes the High Court of Impeachment—a body that the fathers evidently supposed would collect within itself the justice and the majesty of the American people. Was such a high court created to sit and scan and punish paltry errors and indiscretions too insignficant to have a name in the penal code, too paltry for the notice of a police court? This would indeed be employing an elephant to remove an ant hill.

Since the beginning of our national existence a large number of judges of State courts and a few Federal judges have been impeached. A few were corrupt and deserved the condemnation of the people that was visited on them. In most cases, however, the impeachments were for acts that did not amount to impeachable offenses. Shall impeachments be brought on the mere caprice of an excited public, or must they not be on some known law of the country? An impeachment, to be legal, must, without doubt, be for some offense either of omission or commission against some statute of the United States or some statute of a particular State, or against some provision of the common law.

This subject of impeachment will serve as well as, and perhaps better than, any other to illustrate the rule I stated in the beginning, that where the law is uncertain there is no law. And if the laws of a government are uncertain, then that government is not a government of laws but of men, as will be seen as I proceed.

I maintain, as essential to a free government, that no man should be criminally condemned except for the violation of some known law by which he was bound to be governed. Nothing is so necessary to the administration of justice as that the criminal code should be certain and known. Judges, as well as private citizens, should know precisely the path they are to walk in and what they may and may not do. No sword should tremble over the head of a judge; nor should the ground be spread with snares and quicksand that may appear fair to the eye of the traveler. Is there to be one rule of justice for a judge and another for a private citizen, so that while the latter is protected from surprise, from the malice and caprice of every man and every body of men, and can be punished only for the violation of laws made known to him in advance, the former is to be exposed to punishment without knowing his offense, and the criminality or innocence of his conduct is to depend not upon the laws existing at the time but upon the notions of a body of men? If so, a judge may thus be removed from his office for an act strictly legal, if a House of Representatives, Federal or State, according as the judge is a Federal or a State officer, shall choose to consider such act impeachable. It was never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution that the judiciary should thus be laid prostrate at the feet of the House of Representatives. No judge should be placed in jeopardy to satisfy the clamor of an unthinking and unreasoning public. Can a Legislature, Federal or State, create offenses at its will and declare that to be a crime which, when done, was not a crime? It requires the concurrence of both Houses of the Legislature and the President, or the governor, as the case may be, to enact a law, except in those cases where it is passed by a two-thirds vote over a veto. If the House of Representatives of Congress or of a State legislative assembly were to direct that an act heretofore not forbidden by law should hereafter become penal, such declaration would be a mere nullity, unless duly sanctioned by the Senate or the upper house of the State legislature and approved by the President or the governor. Will they then be permitted, in the exercise of their power of impeachment, to create crimes and inflict serious penalties never before suspected to be criminal? If this be true, then every valuable liberty of every impeachable officer is prostrated at the foot of the House of Representatives. We have all heard, and with horror, of the Roman Emperor who placed his laws so high on the pillars of the forum that the best eyes could not read them, but nevertheless severely punished any breach of them. The power sometimes claimed by the House of Representatives to make anything criminal at their pleasure is a thousand times more dangerous, more tyrannical. The laws of Caligula, though fixed on columns however high, might yet, by extraordinary efforts, be deciphered; but here, if the Congress is permitted to misuse the law of impeachment, officers of Government must, to be safe, be able to foresee what will be the changing opinions of men on points of decorum. The rule of conduct lies buried in the bosom of futurity.

I come now to a consideration of the recall of judges. What is this proposition that is agitating the minds of the American people, and that is seriously proposed to be enacted into law? First, let me answer, it is not progressive but is retrogressive. It is a proposal to turn back the pages of history, the cycles of time, for more than 2,000 years and adopt an experiment that wrecked that government of pure democracy the capital of which was the seat of ancient learning. This power of recall existed in Athens more than 400 years before the Christian era, but never existed in a republican form of government until within the last five or six years. It is the weapon of unreasoning agitators and of demagogues. Our very sense of natural justice revolts against it. Actuated by jealousy, moved by malice, without reason or justice to support them, the personal or political enemies of a judge—the dignity of whose position and office forbids him to take to the hustings in defense of himself—start a hue and cry about him that, like a ball of snow rolling down hill, increases as it goes on. The unfounded or greatly magnified accusations of enemies and agitators, the groundless or senseless cry of demagogues, the poisonous whispering of calumny, prepare the voters to complete the destruction of reputation. Voters who have no knowledge of any grievance, without an impartial hearing, without evidence—for calumny is not evidence, except of malice in the heart of him who utters it—without reason or the semblance of justice, exercise the arbitrary and abhorrent power of recall. Behold the result! An honorable and courageous man has been stricken down to satisfy the clamor of the mob; all that was dear to him, save honor, has been ruthlessly snatched and torn away, as were the insignia of rank and authority from the uniform of that gallant, courageous, patient officer of the French Army, Alfred Dreyfus! Contemplate, my friends, this picture of the exercise of the power of recall. It is not overdrawn. It is just such as we may expect to see, and what we will, in fact, see, if the recall of judges is adopted by the American people. In this manner will honorable judges be disgraced and removed from office. When reason is dethroned, when calumny, passion, and prejudice are in the ascendant, the rage of the storm is sure to be great, its devastation terrible!

Is it not, Mr. President, one of the maxims of natural justice, as well as of our jurisprudence, that no man shall be condemned unheard and without a fair trial? Are the American people seriously to contemplate the abandonment of this great principle of natural justice, this polestar that has led us for so many years along paths of safety, this bulwark of our liberties? Ah, let it be hoped that the American people, who, as a whole, have always wanted to be just, reflect before they take so terrible a step. I seem now, Mr. President, to hear an answer from a certain quarter, that a judge against whom the recall is invoked may set forth, under the proposed law, his defense in 200 words. Am I doomed to hear this from a lawyer, from one who has spent his life in the study of that science the aim of which is justice between men? Can not everyone see, upon a moment's reflection, that it is impossible within the compass of 200 words, or even 2,000, to administer an antidote to the poison of the calumny that flows from a single word—corrupt? When the breath of suspicion is whispered in one word against the chastity of a virtuous maiden a thousand words will not suffice to answer and silence it. And so it is with false accusations and vile calumnies hurled against a judge by one whose heart is filled with malice and who is the product of the lowest and most depraved elements of fallen humanity. We are accustomed to trials of another sort; trials where reason and justice rule; trials by impartial jurors before an impartial court; trials where the witnesses are under the restraint and the sanctity of an oath; trials in which accusations may be answered, witnesses cross-examined, and evidence heard and weighed; trials in which the law—not made for that one occasion, but made long before—is adhered to and is declared by a judge who is acting under the restraint of an oath and whose learning enables him to apply the definite and fixed principles of the law. I grant that there are corrupt judges, but, be it said to the credit of the bench and the bar, they are few when compared to the whole number of judges in the United States. If a judge is corrupt he should be removed from office and punished. But let it be done in an orderly, fair, and constitutional manner. If impeachment is not a practical method, then let another be provided, but let it be fair and let it be constitutional.

There are a hundred other reasons why the recall of judges, in the manner proposed is unfair, inexpedient, unwise. But time will not permit of their mention at this time. Mr. President, the recall of judges is subversive, destructive of every principle on which the fathers established our Government—those principles that for more than a century of national existence have insured our liberties, have secured us in our rights, have vouchsafed our happiness and our prosperity.

I wish that I could attract your attention to and point out to you all the indicia of this gangrene of anarchy; but I confess to not being able to accomplish so vast an undertaking, even if time permitted. Allow me, however, time to mention briefly one or two more.

What would be the effect of the incorporation into our laws of this proposed recall upon the conduct of the judges themselves and the necessary resulting effect upon the people? It would make the judges disregardful of the fixed and established rules of law. Judges would appreciate that in order to be secure in their positions they would have to render their decisions not according to those fixed and established principles of rules of law that time and experience have proven to be wise and wholesome, but according to the whims, the desires, the caprices, the fleeting passions, the demands of unreasonable agitators and demagogues. Thus decisions and judgments would be ever varying, according to the changing notions of those who would have the power to recall. No man would be sure of justice; no man would be secure in his person or property. Law would not be uniform; it would be ever changing and uncertain. And we have seen that where the law is uncertain there is no law. A new law would be made for each case, not beforehand but at the time of trial and after the occurrence of the events that might be the subject of investigation and adjudication. All laws would be ex post facto laws which thoughtful men know would be destructive of our liberties. Ours would then be a government of men and not of laws. Chaos would reign; passion, which is ever changing, would be the controlling factor in all decisions. Reflect a moment and compare such a government with the one established by our forefathers, in which reason is the rule, protection and justice the aim. Rather than to live under such a government as the recall of judges would change ours into I would prefer to take my chances in Turkey.

What student of history is there who does not recognize the evils and the tyranny of a pure democracy? A republic is a state in which the sovereignty resides in the people, but in which the administration is lodged in officers elected by and representing the people. It is a representative in contradistinction to a pure democracy. It is a state that is ruled by representatives of the people according to convention, according to established, fixed, and certain laws. While in some instances the power to recall judges has been retained by monarchs and despots I can not recall any instance since ancient days where the recall of judges by popular vote has prevailed. Not until within the past few years, and here in what we are wont and pleased to call the most enlightened Government of either ancient or modern times do we find this obnoxious measure seriously advocated.

The pure and impartial administration of justice is of all things the most important to the people. Who shall be governor of the State or President of the Federal Government or what tariff shall be exacted or general laws passed, occupy the particular attention of politicians. These things concern but seldom the happiness of the great mass of the people; but the impartial administration of law between men comes to every man's door and is essential to every man's happiness and prosperity. For this reason I regard the judiciary the most important one of the three departments of government, and its independence and purity of the most interesting consequence to every man.

While our judges are fully protected from the influence of favor or fear the rights of the people can not be very unsafe; but if judges are to ever be exposed to the threats of those influential with the majority and to be condemned by the mere voice of prejudice can they hold the scales of justice in equipoise with firm hands? No; if the nerves of a judge are of steel they must tremble in so perilous a situation. In England the complete independence of the judiciary has for generations been regarded, and has proven to be, the only sure safeguard of true liberty and the only means of securing known and uniform laws that act upon every man alike. I have heard it suggested that while this independence is very necessary under a monarchy, to secure the people against the oppression of those in power, yet the same reasons for it do not exist under our republican Government. It is argued that it is inconsistent with the nature of our Government for any part of it to be independent of the people from whom all governmental power emanates. I maintain the reverse of this. If I were asked in what kind of government—a monarchy or a republic—the independence of judges is most essential, I would unhesitatingly say in the latter. All governments require permanent principles to give them stability and character. History shows that the want of this has been the great deficiency in republics. No faith can be given at home or abroad to a people whose policies are constantly changing with popular opinion. But if the judiciary is stable and independent, and the rule of justice rests upon certain laws and upon known and fixed principles, it gives a security and character to the government which are essential to its successful intercourse with the outside world and in its internal affairs. This independence is necessary to secure the people against oppression. All history demonstrates that tyranny and oppression are found not in monarchies alone, but in republics as well, both ancient and modern. In republics and democracies oppression springs from the impulse of some sudden passion or prejudice, while, generally, in monarchies it is deliberately planned and carried out. The people never destroy deliberately, and usually return to reflection, and therefore justice, if passion is not kept inflamed. But while the fit is on their spoliation and cruelty are more terrible than that of the most monstrous tyrant. It is to protect them from the violence of their own passion that it is necessary to have fixed and certain laws and a firm, courageous, and independent judiciary that is both able and willing to stay the frenzy of an excited populace.

If a Seneca has been killed under the ferocity of a Nero, a Socrates has been destroyed under the delusion of a republic, an independent judiciary, firm and courageous, with fixed and certain laws, would have saved one from the fury of a tyrant and preserved the other from the madness of a people.

Remember that it was Alexander Hamilton who, after propounding this question: "Why has government been instituted at all?" made this answer: "Because the passions of men will not conform to the dictates of reason and justice without constraint." (Federalist, No. 15.) In establishing our present Government it was the purpose of the fathers not only to free themselves from the tyranny of the English Government but to protect themselves and their posterity against the tyranny of an unrestrained democracy. We are accustomed to hear a jargon about the sovereignty of the people, and that nothing in a republic should be independent of them. This is a hackneyed phrase, and there is none in our language more abused or more misunderstood. I hold that the just and legitimate sovereignty of a people is truly a great thing. It consists in the full acknowledgment that all power originally emanated from them and that all responsibility is finally due to them. This sovereignty does not, however, consist in a right to interfere with the regular and legal operations of their representatives who have been intrusted with the management of public affairs, who are carrying out policies and proceeding according to fixed and definite rules previously provided for them. Having delegated their power, having distributed it for various purposes into various channels, and directed its course within certain well-defined limits, they have no right to impede its orderly exercise by those to whom it has been delegated. Having parted with their power under certain regulations and restrictions, they are done with it for the present, they are bound by their own act. If this be not so what government have we? What rule of conduct? None—but are in a state of savage anarchy and confusion.

A wise man will not trust himself to act upon matters of great concern and importance while in a state of great excitement when his passions are aroused. He will await the return of reason and composure. Why, then, should the people as a whole, among whom are foolish as well as wise men, trust themselves to act during a time of great party rage, public excitement, when the passions of men are aroused, in matters of great moment or when the rights, the property, the liberty, the reputation, or the life of a citizen is the stake?

Our Federal Constitution, upon which all of our State constitutions are patterned, restricts the powers of the three branches or departments of Government. To this fact is due the great importance of the judicial department. And to this fact also is due the necessity of the judiciary being separate from the other departments and absolutely independent of them and the people. Under governments having constitutions that do not limit the powers of the executive and legislative departments the courts are only called upon to construe and apply laws that are made and changed from time to time by the legislature. But our courts, under our form of government, have the added and most important duty of protecting the people against encroachments upon their rights by the Executive and the Legislature, both State and Federal. Illustrations of this are familiar to every lawyer. This function of our courts is more essential to the preservation of the Government itself and its Constitution than any other feature of our Government. To insure the strength and virility of our judicial department of Government and its effective discharge of these important duties, its complete independence is absolutely essential. The independence of the judiciary is therefore necessary to the protection of the citizen and the preservation of our form of government.

The judicial recall would fill the judicial offices with inferior and unscrupulous men. What man of self-respect would be willing to accept a judicial office if he might be removed from office and humiliated for no just cause by the whims or caprice or prejudice of an unreasoning public? No man who would be unwilling to set aside the fixed and settled rules of law; no man who would be unwilling to set aside positive law and engage in judicial legislation; no man who would be unwilling to violate the sacred rights of another; no man who would be unwilling to make his decisions and judgment satisfy the demands of the clamoring, excited mob would dare accept a judicial office. No judge who would hold the scales of justice in equipoise with a firm hand could hold his office. Such impartiality as marked the conduct of Marshall at the trial of Burr would set the recall machinery in motion and bring about the removal of him who would refuse to disregard law and satisfy the demands of the crowd. Thus would our judiciary, instead of being strengthened, instead of having its standard raised, instead of being respected, be degraded and held in scorn and reproach.

Am I to be answered that judges, under the proposed recall, would not yield to the temporary passions of the people? If so, my rejoinder is that history affords ample proof that they would. Besides, our knowledge of human nature and the weaknesses of man must convince us of this. There are many instances in history of judges who, in utter disregard of law and in violation of sacred personal rights, even where the recall did not prevail, in order to court the favor and secure the approbation of the multitude, yielded to their unreasonable, unlawful, and unjust demands. For want of time one instance only can be noticed. I refer to the trial of Jesus of Nazareth before Pontius Pilate. The story of this trial is best told in the language of St. Luke, as follows:

And the whole multitude of them arose and led Him unto Pilate.

And they began to accuse Him, saying, "We found this fellow perverting the nation and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that He Himself is Christ, a king."

And Pilate asked Him, saying, "Art Thou the King of the Jews?" And He answered him and said, "Thou sayest it."

Then said Pilate to the chief priests and to the people, "I find no fault in this man."

And they were the more fierce, saying, "He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place."

When Pilate heard of Galilee he asked whether the man were a Galilean.

And as soon as he knew that He belonged unto Herod's jurisdiction, he sent Him unto Herod, who himself also was at Jerusalem at that time.

And when Herod saw Jesus he was exceeding glad, for he was desirous to see Him of a long season, because he had heard many things of Him, and he hoped to have seen some miracle done by Him.

Then he questioned with Him in many words, but He answered him nothing.

And the chief priests and scribes stood and vehemently accused him.

And Herod with his men of war set him at nought, and mocked him, and arrayed him in a gorgeous robe and sent him again to Pilate.

And the same day Pilate and Herod were made friends together, for before they were at enmity between themselves.

And Pilate, when he had called together the chief priests and the rulers and the people, said unto them, "Ye have brought this man unto me as one that perverteth the people, and, behold, I, having examined him before you, have found no fault in this man touching those things whereof ye accuse him. No; nor yet Herod; for I sent you to him; and, lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto him. I will therefore chastise him and release him." (For of necessity he must release one unto them at the feast.)

And they cried out, all at once, saying, "Away with this man and release unto us Barabbas. (Who, for a certain sedition made in the city, and for murder, was cast into prison.)

Pilate therefore, willing to release Jesus, spake again unto them.

But they cried, saying, "Crucify him; crucify him."

And he said unto them the third time, "Why, what evil hath he done? I have found no cause of death in him; I will therefore chastise him and let him go."

And they were instant, with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified. And the voices of them and of the chief priests prevailed.

And Pilate gave sentence that it should be as they required.

And he released unto them him that for sedition and murder was cast into prison, whom them had desired; but he delivered Jesus to their will.

Doubt ye, my friends, that similar scenes would be enacted under the recall of judges? No; they would be of common occurrence.

I hear in some quarters the argument that if judges are recalled unjustly they will be vindicated by posterity. Yes; that may be true; but the judgment of posterity is slow in forming, and the unfortunate judges who would be humiliated and wronged would not be here to learn of their vindication.

Let us reflect upon the words, bearing directly upon the independence of the judiciary, of James Madison and Alexander Hamilton, two sages whose Federalist papers give us the best and clearest understanding of the intention of the framers of the Constitution. Mr. Madison, in writing about the tyranny of a temporary majority, says:

From this view of the subject it may be concluded that a pure democracy, by which I mean a society consisting of a small number of citizens who assemble and administer the government in person, can admit of no cure for the mischiefs of faction. A common passion or interest will in almost every case be felt by a majority of the whole, a communication and concert result from the form of government itself; and there is nothing to check the inducements to sacrifice the weaker party or an obnoxious individual. Hence it is that such democracies have ever been spectacles of turbulence and contention; have ever been found incompatible with personal security or the rights of property, and have, in general, been as short in their lives as they have been violent in their deaths.

A republic, by which I mean a government in which the scheme of representation takes place, opens a different prospect and promises the cure for which we are seeking. Let us examine the points in which it differs from a pure democracy and we shall comprehend both the nature of the cure and the efficacy which it must derive from the union.

And the following is from the pen of Mr. Hamilton:

The complete independence of the courts of justice is peculiarly essential in a limited constitution. By a limited constitution I understand one which contains certain specified exceptions to the legislative authority, such, for instance, as that it shall pass no bills of attainder, no ex post facto laws, and the like. Limitations of this kind can be preserved in practice in no other way than through the medium of courts of justice, whose duty it must be to declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the constitution void. Without this all the reservation of particular rights or privileges would amount to nothing.

This independence of the judges is equally requisite to guard the constitution and the rights of individuals from the effects of those ill humors which the arts of designing men or the influence of particular conjunctures sometimes disseminate among the people themselves, and which, though they speedily give place to better information and more delicate reflection, have a tendency in the meantime to occasion dangerous innovations in the government and serious oppressions of the minor party in the community.

In 1829, when John Marshall was 74 years old, he was chosen a member of a convention to revise the constitution of his native State. In that convention, upon the subject of judicial tenure, he spoke, as it is said, "with the fervor and almost the authority of an apostle." No one in that body of great men knew so well as he how a judge, standing between the powerful and the powerless, is bound to administer justice to both, and that, for this reason, his own position should be beyond the power or reach of any mortal man or set of men. This is what he said:

Advert, sir, to the duties of a judge. He has to pass between the Government and the man whom that Government is prosecuting—between the most powerful individual in the community and the poorest and most unpopular. It is of the last importance that in the performance of these duties he should observe the utmost fairness. Need I press the necessity of this? Does not every man feel that his own personal security and the security of his property depend upon that fairness? The judicial department comes home in its effects to every man's fireside; it passes on his property, his reputation, his life, his all. Is it not to the last degree important that he should be rendered perfectly and completely independent, with nothing to control him but God and his conscience? * * * I acknowledge that, in my judgment, the whole good which may grow out of this convention, be it what it may, will never compensate for the evil of changing the judicial tenure of office. * * * I have always thought from my earliest youth till now that the greatest scourge an angry Heaven ever inflicted upon an ungrateful and sinning people was an ignorant, a corrupt, or a dependent judiciary.

For those who may think that Madison and Hamilton and Marshall lived too long ago for their words of advice to be followed in this day of "progressiveism," let me quote a short paragraph from the pen of an up-to-date progressive. It is that scholarly statesman who now, as its nominee for the great office of President, bears aloft the standard of the Democratic Party, Woodrow Wilson, whose language I borrow:

The recall of judges is another matter. Judges are not lawmakers. They are not administrators. Their duty is not to determine what the law shall be, but to determine what the law is. Their independence, their sense of dignity and freedom, is of the first consequence to the stability of the state. To apply to them the principle of the recall is to set up the idea that the determinations of what the law is must respond to popular impulse and to popular judgment. It is sufficient that the people should have the power to change the law when they will. It is not necessary that they should directly influence by threat of recall those who merely interpret the law already established.

The judicial recall, if adopted, would not only discourage but prevent lawyers possessing high ideals from accepting judicial offices. No such lawyer would permit himself to be placed in a position where he would have to decide cases contrary to his conscience or else suffer the humiliation and disgrace of being removed from office. The adoption of judicial recall would be a return to the tyranny of a pure democracy. It is contrary to the fundamental principle of a republican form of government, which is to protect the people from the tyranny of the executive, the minority from the tyranny of the majority. One of the principles of a republican form of government is that the people, in whom the sovereignty resides, shall manage the affairs of government only through representatives duly selected for that purpose. To the maintenance of such a government it is essential that there should be a separate judicial department that is independent not only of the executive and legislative departments, but also of the majority of the people. The judicial recall would destroy both the representative character of the Government and the judicial system.

Muckraking newspapers and magazines to the contrary, I nevertheless maintain that it is not necessary to disturb the independence of the judiciary in order to settle the economic questions that now agitate the American people or the controversy between labor and capital.

I must notice now, Mr. President, for a moment only, that other and wilder proposition that has lately been advanced to foist upon the American people what is termed the recall of judicial decisions. If this proposition had not come from a man whose prominence and previous connection with the Government in the most exalted office within the gift of the people demand for him respectful attention, I would not deem it necessary or dignified to even mention the subject, so perfectly ridiculous and silly it is.

To adopt this measure would be to compass the destruction of our republican form of government at one bound, in one fell swoop. Most all that I have said about the recall of judges applies with equal, if not greater, force to this silly, though dangerous, proposal. Picture to yourselves, please, the effect of such a power in the people, the working of such a law, if law it could be called. First, it would be a repeal, in effect if not in terms, of the Constitution—of every provision in that title deed to our liberties. There would no longer be any restrictions upon the passage of laws, upon the Executive, upon anything or anybody, except the restrictions that would be born of the fear of the terrors and ravages of unrestrained anarchy. This subject is not worthy of the serious consideration of men of sense, and I will waste no further time with it. I prefer to leave it where I found it, with the gentleman whose prowess as a hunter of wild and rapacious animals in the jungles and on the plains of Africa will be for him, with posterity, a greater claim to distinction than will be his bringing forward this revolutionary doctrine for the serious consideration of an intelligent people. Under such a state of anarchy as the recall of decisions would surely bring about we might expect to see such scenes reenacted as the people of Rome were accustomed to see under the worst of the Emperors. The annals of the Emperors show a various picture of human nature which we would vainly seek among the characters of modern history. We may trace in the conduct of the Emperors of the Roman Empire the utmost lines of both vice and virtue—the meanest degeneracy and the most exalted perfection. The unparalleled vice of the unworthy successors of Augustus and the magnificent theater on which they were enacted saved them from oblivion. The unrelenting Tiberius, the ferocious Caligula, the weak Claudius, the profligate and cruel Nero, and the beastly Vitellius are now condemned to everlasting infamy. So let it be with this infamous doctrine.

Though not much accustomed to talk about the will of the people, I know of no one who bows with more reverence to that will, when constitutionally declared, than I. But, Mr. President, shall we give up the Constitution, this sheet anchor of personal rights, to commit ourselves to the storm of party rage, personal animosity, and popular caprice? Shall we throw away this great landmark, established by the wisdom and the patriotism of the sages who brought forth our republican government? Instead of having our sacred rights secured by fixed and known principles of law, shall we leave them to be frittered away by the ever-varying passions of the moment? No, sir; I hope not. Let us remember that unjust principles that are adopted for particular purposes are two-edged swords, which will rebound on the head of him who uses them; and that justice, although it may be an inconvenient restraint on us when we are strong, is the only sure rampart behind which we may hope to find protection when we become weak. Power which depends on popular favor is, Mr. President, of all things under the sun, the most fleeting and transient, it being sure, from time to time, to change hands. When those who now control the thunder of the power of recall shall themselves occupy, as they soon may, a situation where they may be stricken down by its bolts, they will be glad to invoke, and unless the people now set a great example of good government, will invoke in vain those constitutional securities which have insured our national happiness and prosperity for more than a century and a quarter. These considerations of themselves, Mr. President, must strike the mind with a force that can not be increased by any efforts of mine. It is sufficient merely to bring them into the view of reasonable citizens.

The duty that is imposed on judges is at all times delicate, and in cases where life or liberty may be affected, where reputation depends on the issue, the judge's duty becomes peculiarly arduous to one possessing an honorable and a generous mind. The most delicate and most embarrassing of all situations must be that of a judge presiding upon the trial of a person who, from political or any other cause may have excited hostile feelings in his mind. It is then that an honorable judge most dreads the influence of his passions. It is then that he needs fixed laws that will support his conduct, his decisions, and his judgment lest he should afford ground for the suspicion that he gratified his resentments under the semblance of executing the law.

Fixed rules of law are of even greater importance to one called upon to answer a charge of having committed crime. When the rules of law defining offenses are certain and fixed, then is every man safe, because he may know the law. But if in each particular case that is to be the law which the passions, the prejudices, or the political views of the moment may dictate, then, indeed, are we in a desperate situation and was the blood of our fathers shed in vain. So monstrous a principle can not be endured, and I hope will not receive even the temporary sanction of the American people.

In governments such as ours there will ever be a conflict of parties. Must a judge be in favor of the ruling power, whether right or wrong? Or must he, anticipating the triumph of the minority, however improper their views may be, act with them? And shall a judge, by conscientiously performing his duty, and thereby offending one or perhaps both parties, be made the victim of the one or the other, perhaps of each, as they successively have power? I hope not. A judge should feel safe so long as he violates no law, so long as he discharges his duty in an impartial manner, regardless of whom he may displease thereby.

To a judge it must be the sweetest consolation that when he has sentenced a fellow citizen to dishonor and disgrace, he has merely pronounced the decision of the law rather than his own. This fact must soothe his mind under the anguish which it must feel from looking upon another's distress. Who is there, I ask, who would want our judges to court the applause of the auditors rather than have them act from principle? No one, I hope. Who would wish them to be popular judges, who look forward in all their decisions not for the approval of the wise and good of their conscience, but of the rabble or any prevailing party? The American people have been wont to boast of theirs as a government of laws, but it can not be such unless the laws are impartially, without regard to popularity, carried into execution. Will judges be permitted to say: "This law I will execute, and this I will not; because in the first case the law is popular and in the other it is not"? No. The security of our most sacred rights depends on us having judges who will with firmness and courage, even sternness, discharge their duties impartially. It is the duty of judges to enforce the laws regardless of how unpopular they may be to any portion of the community. If the holy sanctuary of our courts is to be invaded by party feeling or popular prejudice, and if justice is to suffer her garments to be stained by the foul venom of political bigotry, we may indeed fear the ruin that will surely follow.

If time be measured by the life of nations it was not so very long ago that the fathers established on this Western Hemisphere a government upon principles that had then been untried in political science—and that government was looked upon by friends with anxiety, by enemies with open derision. A little more than a hundred years have passed since then; and now the result of the experiment of the fathers is open to the contemplation of the world. The Republic, born of patriotism and a love of liberty and reared aloft upon the principles of the Constitution, still stands, exceeding the hopes of its founders, silencing by its achievements the doubts of the incredulous and the derision of its enemies. It stands to-day, in all its majesty, surpassing in grandeur the most renowned governments of modern as well as of ancient times. After passing through the vicissitudes of political strife of more than a century the Republic is still united, has the same protecting Constitution, and is so strong as to banish all fear of attack from without and be secure from all dangers from within except the perils of degeneracy.

Conscious of having detained you much too long, my apology is my zeal for the cause in which I speak. In conclusion, let me express the hope that the bar of this country, in this hour of peril, will not be found wanting in the discharge of the duty that rests upon us—the duty of staying the hand of anarchy masquerading under the form and in the name of the recall of judges; the duty of preserving to ourselves and our descendants a government of laws and an independent judiciary.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 9, 1913,

On House resolution 824, paying tribute to the memory of Hon. GEORGE H. UTTER, late a Representative from the State of Rhode Island.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with Mr. UTTER had been longer than with any other Member of this House, for we were students together at Amherst College, and I have ever since watched with interest and admiration his brilliant career, of which his college life gave promise. The clever and attractive boy developed into the powerful and popular man. As a member of the Rhode Island Legislature, the speaker of the house, and governor of the State, he proved himself a man of ability, tact, and broad statesmanship, and when he entered this House he had the qualities and the experience to make him at once influential and useful. Although his service here has been short, he had already made for himself a reputation which foreshadowed a prominent position. He was attentive and industrious—eager to familiarize himself with the peculiar rules and atmosphere of this body and winning by his sound judgment and sensible views the confidence of his colleagues, while in the few instances he participated actively in the proceedings he showed himself a strong, fluent debater. He was master, too, on occasion, of a warm and inspiring eloquence, and with his cultivated and charming personality was in every way fitted to make his mark in this body and be of valuable service both to his district and to the country. In his untimely death so early in his service I mourn a warm personal friend of whose genuine worth I am sure, because I knew him from boyhood, before we had learned to conceal our weaknesses, and I mourn, too, a public official whose sterling abilities, firm character, and honorable ambition insured him distinction and influence.

Commercialized Vice Must Go.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. SMITH,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 25, 1913.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an editorial from the North American, of Philadelphia, of Saturday, February 15, 1913.

The editorial is as follows:

COMMERCIALIZED VICE MUST GO.

We wonder what would be the effect if it became known through the press this morning that 100,000 victims of smallpox were at large in the United States; that they were neither isolated nor under observation, but mixing freely with the unsuspecting public; that physicians knew of the condition, but preserved a professional reticence about it; that city and State boards of health ignored it; and that the sources of infection were being permitted to flourish unchecked, even unscrutinized.

In such case, we fancy, the North American would offend the esthetic feelings of the conservative by the violence of its headlines; business and reform organizations would meet and pass drastic resolutions; from a thousand pulpits to-morrow would resound vigorous denunciation of official indifference and demands for prompt measures to stamp out the plague.

Happily, this frightful peril does not exist. Newspapers, physicians, and boards of health are alive to the menace of smallpox. A single case will cause a whole city block to be quarantined; 10 cases will instigate action as against an epidemic. Yet there is an evil which is infinitely more insidious and more widespread, which claims a thousand times more victims, and which is a more deadly peril to the whole race of mankind. And it receives less attention from press, pulpit, and the public than dangers which, compared to it, are trifling.

In this, as in every other matter, public opinion simply needs information. The social evil, which is the menace to which we refer, presents a problem which will never be settled by visionaries or fanatics; nor, indeed, by experts, however fortified by knowledge and inspired by zeal. It must be dealt with by the public; and the education of the public devolves upon the medical profession, official investigators, and the magazine and newspaper press.

This necessity for plain speaking concerning a plain peril is being better recognized every day. Two notable utterances upon the subject in Philadelphia on Thursday were reported in the daily papers; and as there spreads a realization of what the problem implies, we look for even greater frankness and emphasis.

When physicians feel called upon, as they do in increasing numbers, to deliver public warnings; when such men as John D. Rockefeller, jr., devote time and money to the work of education; when citizens band together in federations to combat the evil, and when such lofty-minded women as Jane Addams discuss publicly its dreadful effects, there is no longer any excuse for silence or for attempts to minimize the condition.

Upon this, as upon every other evil, public opinion is subject to growth. Efforts to treat the matter scientifically have met heretofore a hopeless inertia. Vast numbers of decent, high-minded citizens deplored the prevalence of the system, but argued that it had existed always, hence always would exist; that it was due to the defects of human nature and never could be eradicated, but could only be regulated, supervised, tolerated.

To-day such ignorant apologists are becoming more rare. As Miss Addams says in A New Conscience and an Ancient Evil, a book which Collier's Weekly says it would be worth $1,000,000 to put into a million homes:

"Those of us who think they discern the beginnings of a new conscience in regard to this twin of slavery, as old and outrageous as slavery itself and even more persistent, find a possible analogy between certain civic, philanthropic, and educational efforts directed against the very existence of this social evil and similar organized efforts which preceded the overthrow of slavery in America."

Clearly, it is a matter of an awakened public conscience. And that awakening is coming about through such utterances as the book of this gifted woman and the addresses delivered here on Thursday night. We quote from Dr. Howard A. Kelly, of Johns Hopkins, one of the foremost of surgeons and scientists:

"What have you done toward fighting prostitution in Philadelphia? Nothing. * * * There are three ways of dealing with the problem. They are indifference, segregation, and complete elimination. We are doing the last in Baltimore. * * *

"Segregation exerts a debasing influence upon the entire community. Men lose their sense of right and wrong. I find it hard to interest churchmen in this movement. The church must get into politics. It is the agency that can deal with it after we workers have the vice purveyors scattered and demoralized. You have tolerated vice in this city."

Again, we quote from Clifford G. Roe, assistant district attorney of Chicago and an adviser to the Philadelphia vice commission: "Segregation is a failure."

Indifference, segregation, or abolition—which shall it be? No citizen of decent instincts would recommend indifference; the choice lies between the other two. And here we see the clearest evidence of the change in public opinion. Not many years ago segregation, or, at least, a form of toleration, was held to be the only effective solution. Its advocates professed utter abhorrence of the traffic, but they repeated the worn platitudes about "an evil as old as man," and pointed to the "scientific" control of vice in Europe. To-day, as the result of exhaustive inquiry, segregation is being abandoned in Europe and is condemned as a deadly aggravation of the disease.

The most powerful national associations formed to deal with the problem are making abolition their aim. The vice commission of Chicago, whose report is standard the world over, recommended law enforcement looking to final elimination of the traffic. The Minneapolis commission, after several members had been converted by the evidence they gathered, unanimously urged the same course.

As Miss Addams convincingly shows, the course of this question is analogous to that of slavery. Long before that evil—also "as old as the race"—had been extinguished it was subject to international as well as National and State laws of restriction and regulation. In this country private citizens aided the escape of slaves, just as private organizations now help to rescue victims of vice.

Long before the Nation actually rose in arms to end the enslavement of human beings, the system was denounced by reformers, sociologists, economists, and humanitarians, just as commercialized vice is attacked to-day. The legal and political obstacles to the obliteration of vice are no greater than those which hedged about negro slavery. Yet in time that evil went. And when the "new conscience" is fully awake, this present-day wrong will go, too.

Over against the solemn warnings of the medical profession and the findings of investigators who have given years to study of the problem we have, of course, the political influence of the promoters of the traffic, the resistance of corrupt police officials who find in tolerated vice everywhere the most fruitful source of dishonest gain, and, in Philadelphia, the disorganizing babble of a callow incompetent as the responsible head of the police department.

But the American people have a singular gift of common sense in dealing with a public evil, when once it is made clear to them that it demands their action and the facts are laid plainly before them. And we repeat that settlement of this problem awaits only an adequate education of public opinion.

Frankly, we may say that our own belief in the necessity for a war of extermination against the social evil and the possibility of an approximate success in the undertaking is a matter of this same education. We have grown up to the idea by studying the findings of physicians and other trained investigators.

There was a time when tuberculosis and typhoid and the deadly commonplace diseases of childhood were regarded as visitations from heaven upon a sinful race. Education and agitation are reducing the mortality from all such preventable ills and restricting year by year their spread in communities where they appear. The social evil is coming to be regarded in the same way, as an intolerable, preventable menace to the public; and when that truth takes full hold of the American mind extinction of it will be inevitable.

As to the general peril, we have no intention here to harrow the feelings of our readers. We shall simply give a paragraph more from Miss Addams's work:

"Experiments in segregation, in licensed systems, and certification have not been considered successful. The medical profession, hitherto divided in opinion as to the feasibility of such undertakings, is virtually united in the conclusion that so long as commercialized vice exists physicians can not guarantee a city against the spread of the contagious poison generated by it, which is fatal alike to the individual and his offspring.

"The medical profession agrees that, as the victims of the social evil inevitably become the purveyors of germ diseases of a very persistent and incurable type, safety in this regard lies only in the extinction of commercialized vice. It is at last taking the position that the community wishing to protect itself against this contagion will in the end be driven to the extermination of the very source itself."

Economic waste and the dictates of decency and humanity have not been sufficient to cause a general demand for the stamping out of this monstrous evil. Civic indifference has tolerated it, depravity has battened upon it and official ignorance, made worse by a prurient curiosity has committed such disgraceful follies as treating it with regulations as to music, closing hours, and the length of the garments to be worn by the victims.

Now, society is being awakened by an alarmed sense of self-preservation; and when that is thoroughly aroused nothing short of extermination will satisfy the demand. This evil will in time be virtually obliterated. And the work will be done just as soon as public opinion reaches a decision that it is to be done.

Public Buildings.

SPEECH

OF

HON. JOHN L. BURNETT,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 17, 1913.

The House had under consideration the bill (H. R. 28766) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, the characteristic insinuation of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] that this bill is corrupt in its nature is unjustified by the facts. The gentleman has not compared it with other bills of like character that have passed this Congress year by year. He denounces this as the worst of all without knowing one thing or giving one fact to justify such a statement. He will find, if he will investigate, that we are making appropriations in this bill for the construction of buildings on sites where the sites were authorized three years ago, and the postal receipts now barely reach the $10,000 necessary in order to have free delivery service. These sites when authorized fell far below $10,000 annual post-office receipts. The gentleman makes this, like many other reckless statements, without comparison or investigation as to what the other bills have done.

It comes with poor grace from the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to undertake to lecture his colleagues upon the question of economy when he himself was in the caucus when the question of public buildings came up. Outside of the caucus it was understood that he was opposed to any battleships, and yet suddenly, I suppose because the gentleman had some kind of a dream that made him believe that the Japs were on their way to take the Brooklyn Navy Yard or attack his city, he changed over and clamored for a battleship.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. I can not, for I have not the time. The gentleman knows that he was opposed to any battleships and afterwards pleaded for one battleship. Now, I ask him, when it comes to a vote on the naval bill, whether he will vote for two battleships or one?

Mr. Speaker, I read many years ago of a crab that said to his son, "Walk in the straight way"; but the son says, "Father, first let me see you walk in the straight way, and then I will follow."

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] in his attack on the bill made several mistakes. He refers to Marion, Ky., where he says there is a small population. The receipts there are $11,162, and they have a civil service, and that is the reason for giving them the amount we did for their building. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] refers to his place, with 2,641 population and $7,633 receipts, and we allowed him $5,000 for a site. I have not heard him raise the question of personal privilege and move to strike it out. As a rule, those who are fighting the bill are disappointed because the committee did not allow them all they wanted, or those who live in the big cities and have already had immense sums appropriated for sites and buildings. Now, because you Members from the smaller towns are recognized by this bill, they suddenly become the watchdogs of the Treasury and raise a howl for economy. Gentlemen, I have only $18,000 in this entire bill, and it could fail without materially hurting me or my district, but I stand here to try to protect you Members from the rural districts from the greed of those who wish to spend all the money of your constituents on battleships and navy yards. [Applause.]

Loan of Money.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. L. C. DYER,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 20, 1913.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following:

The recent law enacted by Congress providing for the regulation of the business of loaning money, other than by national banks, and so forth, in the District of Columbia has attracted wide attention from States and municipalities, and many requests have come to me and to other Members of Congress for the details of this law. To assist in the publicity of this law, I insert herewith a copy of the law as enacted, to wit:

[Public, No. 359—H. R. 8768.]

An act to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, and real-estate brokers in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter it shall be unlawful and illegal to engage in the District of Columbia in the business of loaning money upon which a rate of interest greater than 6 per cent per annum is charged on any security of any kind, direct or collateral, tangible or intangible, without procuring license; and all persons, firms, voluntary associations, joint-stock companies, incorporated societies, and corporations engaged in said business shall pay a license tax of $500 per annum to the District of Columbia. No license shall be granted to any person, firm, or voluntary association unless such person and the members of any such firm or voluntary association shall be bona fide residents of the District of Columbia, and no license shall be granted for a period longer than one year, and no license shall be granted to any joint-stock company, incorporated society, or corporation unless and until such company, society, or corporation shall, in writing and in due form, to be first approved by and filed with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, appoint an agent, resident in the District of Columbia, upon whom all judicial and other process or legal notice directed to such company, society, or corporation may be served. And in the case of the death, removal from the District, or any legal disability or disqualification of any such agent, service of such process or notice may be made upon the assessor of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That applications for license to conduct such business must be made in writing to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and shall contain the full names and addresses of applicants, if natural persons, and in the case of firms and voluntary associations, the full names and addresses of all the members thereof, and in the case of joint-stock companies, incorporated societies, and corporations, the full names and addresses of the officers and directors thereof and under what law or laws organized or incorporated, and the place where such business is to be conducted, and such other information as the said commissioners may require. Every license granted shall date from the 1st of the month in which it is issued and expire on the 31st day of the following October, and such license shall be kept conspicuously displayed in the place of business of the licensee. Every application shall be filed not less than 30 days prior to the granting of such license, and notice of the filing of such application shall be posted in the office of the assessor of the said District and be published twice a week for three successive weeks in a daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia. Protest may be made by any person to the issuing of such license, and when such protests are filed with the said commissioners the latter shall give public notice of and hold a public hearing upon such protests before issuing such license. The said commissioners shall have the power to reject any application for license after a hearing upon such protest or for failure on the part of the applicant to observe this act, or when such applicant shall have violated its provisions.

SEC. 3. That each application shall be accompanied by a bond to the District of Columbia in the penal sum of $5,000, with two or more sufficient sureties, and conditioned that the obligor will not violate any law relating to such business. The execution of any such bond by a fidelity or surety company authorized by the laws of the United States to transact business therein shall be equivalent to the execution thereof by two sureties, and such company, if excepted to, shall justify in the manner required by law of fidelity and surety companies. If any person shall be aggrieved by the misconduct of any such licensed person, firm, voluntary association, joint-stock company, incorporated society, or corporation, or by his, their, or its violation of any law relating to such business, and shall recover a judgment therefor, such person or his personal representative or heirs or distributees may, after a return unsatisfied either in whole or in part of any execution issued upon such judgment, maintain an action in his own name upon such bond herein required in any court having jurisdiction of the amount claimed. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall furnish to anyone applying therefor a certified copy of any such bond filed with them, upon the payment of a fee of 25 cents, and such certified copy shall be prima facie evidence in any court that such bond was duly executed and delivered by the person, firm, voluntary association, joint-stock company, incorporated society, or corporation whose names appear thereon. Said bond shall be renewed and refiled annually in October of each year, or the licensed person, firm, voluntary association, joint-stock company, incorporated society, or corporation shall, within 30 days thereafter, cease doing business, and their license shall be revoked by the said commissioners, but said bond until renewed and refiled as aforesaid shall be and remain in full force and effect.

SEC. 4. That every person, firm, voluntary association, joint-stock company, incorporated society, or corporation conducting such business shall keep a register, approved by said commissioners, showing, in English, the amount of money loaned, the date when loaned and when due, the person to whom loaned, the property or thing named as security for the loan, where the same is located and in whose possession, the amount of interest, all fees, commissions, charges, and renewals charged, under whatever name. Such register shall be open for inspection to the said commissioners, their officers and agents, on every day, except Sundays and legal holidays, between the hours of 9 o'clock in the forenoon and 5 o'clock in the afternoon. Every such person, firm, voluntary association, joint-stock company, incorporated society, or corporation conducting such business shall, on or before the 20th day of January of each year, make to the said commissioners an annual statement in the form of a trial balance of its books on the 31st day of December in each year, specifying the different kinds of its liabilities and the different kinds of its assets, stating the amount of each, together with such other information as may be called for.

SEC. 5. That no such person, firm, voluntary association, joint-stock company, incorporated society, or corporation shall charge or receive a greater rate of interest upon any loan made by him or it than 1 per cent per month on the actual amount of the loan, and this charge shall cover all fees, expenses, demands, and services of every character, including notarial and recording fees and charges, except upon the foreclosure of the security. The foregoing interest shall not be deducted from the principal of loan when same is made. Every such person, firm, voluntary association, joint-stock company, incorporated society, or corporation conducting such business shall furnish the borrower a written, typewritten, or printed statement at the time the loan is made, showing, in English, in clear and distinct terms, the amount of the loan, the date when loaned and when due, the person to whom the loan is made, the name of the lender, the amount of interest charged, and the lender shall give the borrower a plain and complete receipt for all payments made on account of the loan at the time such payments are made. No such loan greater than $200 shall be made to any one person: Provided, That any person contracting, directly or indirectly, for, or receiving a greater rate of interest than that fixed in this act, shall forfeit all interest so contracted for or received; and in addition thereto shall forfeit to the borrower a sum of money, to be deducted from the amount due for principal, equal to one-fourth of the principal sum: And provided further, That any person in the employ of the Government who shall loan money in violation of the provisions of this act shall forfeit his office or position, and be removed from the same.

SEC. 6. That complaints against any licensee or applicant for a license shall be made in writing to the said commissioners, and notice thereof of not less than 3 days shall be given to said licensee or applicant by serving upon him a concise statement of the facts constituting the complaint, and a hearing shall be had before the said commissioners within 10 days from the date of the filing of the complaint, and no adjournment shall be taken for longer than one week. A daily calendar shall be kept of all hearings by the said commissioners, which shall be posted in a conspicuous place in their public office for at least 3 days before the date of such hearings. The said commissioners shall render their decision within 8 days from the time the matter is finally submitted to them. Said commissioners shall keep a record of all such complaints and hearings, and may refuse to issue and shall suspend or revoke any license for any good cause shown, within the meaning and purpose of this act; and when it is shown to their satisfaction, whether as a result of a written complaint as aforesaid or otherwise, that any licensee or applicant under this act, either before or after conviction, is guilty of any conduct in violation of this or any law relating to such business it shall be the duty of the said commissioners to suspend or revoke the license of such licensee or reject the petition of the applicant, but notice of the written complaint or proposed action shall be presented to and reasonable opportunity shall be given said licensee or applicant to be heard in his defense. Whenever for any cause such license is revoked, said commissioners shall not issue another license to said licensee until the expiration of at least one year from the date of revocation of such license, and not at all if such licensee shall have been convicted of a violation of this act under the provisions of the following section thereof.

SEC. 7. That any violation of this act shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 and not greater than $200, or by imprisonment in the jail or the workhouse of the District of Columbia for not less than 5 nor more than 30 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. The said commissioners shall cause the corporation counsel to institute criminal proceedings for the enforcement of this act before any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 8. That in any foreclosure on any loan made under this act no charges for attorneys' or agents' fees shall be made or collected which will exceed 10 per cent of the amount found due in such foreclosure proceedings.

SEC. 9. That in any contract made in pursuance of the provisions of this act it shall be unlawful to incorporate any provision for liquidated or other damages as a penalty for any default or forfeiture thereunder.

SEC. 10. That nothing contained in this act shall be held to apply to the legitimate business of national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, or real-estate brokers, as defined in the act of Congress of July 1, 1902.

SEC. 11. That the enforcement of this act shall be intrusted to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and they are hereby authorized and empowered to make all rules and regulations necessary in their judgment for the conduct of such business and the enforcement of this act in addition hereto and not inconsistent herewith.

SEC. 12. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby rpealed.

SEC. 13. That this act shall take effect at the expiration of 30 days from and after the date of its passage.

Approved, February 4, 1913.

The enactment of the above law is intended to regulate and control one of the greatest evils in the city of Washington. When I introduced this bill in the House on May 5, 1911, I had in mind not only the necessity of putting a ban on this great evil in the District of Columbia, but also had in mind that the enactment of such a law by Congress would arouse the interest of the legislators in the various States and other large cities and spur them on to pass laws governing this evil in the States, and so forth. The law as enacted is somewhat different from the bill which I originally introduced. My bill provided for a rate of 2 per cent per month as the highest legal rate to be charged as interest for the loaning of money by these concerns, and only included the money sharks and not the pawnbrokers. Amendments were passed by Congress, however, reducing the rate of interest from 2 to 1 per cent a month and including in its provisions pawnbrokers. The need of such a law as this in all the States and cities of this country is apparent to anyone who will give the matter consideration. This evil has grown to such proportions that homes are destroyed, suicides occur, and many men and women lose their positions and employment. I cite below a few cases that came to my attention while preparing the bill which I introduced in Congress and which afterwards became a law, as above set forth:

LOAN CASES IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

A. A woman whose daughter came down with tuberculosis was told by the doctor she must be sent away for this reason at once. She borrowed $100 from a prominent money lender in this city, and besides paying a fee of $1.50 gave 12 monthly notes for $11.70 each, making $140.40. This is equivalent to paying back the $100 in 12 payments of $8.33 a month apart; the rest is interest.

Interest on $8.33 for one month at 6 per cent is $0.04167; at 1 per cent is $0.006945. Time—78 monthly periods × $0.006945 is $0.5417 at 1 per cent. Interest charged, besides fee, $40.40. $\frac{$40.40}{.5417}$ is 74 + per cent per annum, actual rate charged.

For a woman with a sick daughter: She made eight payments, and then a lawyer helped her out by making a settlement at 6 per cent under threat of prosecution.

B. A young man in a Government bureau had to have $35. He got it from a man who had started in the loaning business recently and gave five monthly notes of $8.95 each—$44.75. This equals 15 monthly payments on one-fifth of the amount borrowed—$7, and the rest is interest.

Interest one month on $7 at 6 per cent, $0.035; at 1 per cent, $0.005833; 15×$0.005833=$0.0875, is interest at 1 per cent. $\frac{$0.75}{.0875}$ is 111+ per cent per annum, rate charged, and in this case actually collected.

C. A man borrowed $140, giving a mortgage and another name as surety and making 12 monthly notes of $17 each, $204. This is equivalent to paying back $140 at $11.6666 per month; remainder of $64 is interest. Equals 78 monthly periods.

Interest on $11.6666 for one month at 6 per cent is $0.05833; at 1 per cent is $0.009722; 78×$0.009722 is $0.7583, interest at 1 per cent on all. $\frac{$64.00}{.7583}$ is 84+ per cent per annum, rate actually paid on a well-secured loan of this size.

D. From another lender a man got $25, paying $1 fee and giving 10 semimonthly notes of $4.20 each, or $42 for the $24 received. This is equivalent to paying back the amount at the rate of $2.40 each half month and the remainder, of $18, is interest and fee.

Interest on $2.40 for one-half month at 6 per cent is $0.006; at 1 per cent is $0.001; 55 periods at $0.001 is $0.055. $\frac{$18.00}{.055}$ is 327 per cent per annum.

If the $1 fee is left out, calling interest $17, it still equals 309 per cent.

This is the worst I have found yet; but there is no limit. They take all they can get.

Two per cent a month will help these people.

[2] Loan reported by Miss Isabel L. Strong, made about March 17, 1910, the day after the Senate hearing on this bill.
[3] Semimonthly.

A little over two years ago in Philadelphia a printer borrowed $24 of a loan shark to save the life of his little girl, who had diphtheria and needed an expert physician and antitoxin. Incidentally, the life of the girl was saved. The man agreed to pay $30 in one month, but when the $30 was due it was impossible to pay it all and at the same time pay the necessary living expenses. The loan shark, however, took $6, canceled the old loan, and placed him in the same position he had been in to begin with. Each month for two years the printer has paid $6 upon the original loan of $24. He still owes $30 and he has paid $144.

A young fellow of good family and lax associations received an inheritance of about $50,000 more than four years ago. In a year he had run through all but about $10,000 of his money. While he still had a nest egg he met, in a poker gun, a man who operates four or five salary loan offices in the lake cities. Mr. Blank wanted to establish a new office in Detroit and he lacked the available capital to do it. He explained to the young man the advantages of the salary-loan business as an investment, and guaranteed to double the money in three months.

The boy went in as manager, but he stayed only two weeks in the office when he found, as all the sharks do, the advantage of women, and employed one at $75 a month to take his place. That was in July, 1906. In July, 1909, the young fellow (whose uncle is authority for this statement) sold out his interest in the business to Blank for $100,000. Besides he had taken out, in the course of the three years, an additional $75,000. That is only 585 per cent profit per annum.

The best known salary loan lender is D. H. Tolman, who advertises that he operates offices in 68 different cities. "The emperor of salary sharks" he is called. He went into the business in 1892 with a capital of $18,000. To-day he is a multimillionaire with offices in every important city in the United States and Canada.

Mr. Speaker, to show the extreme length to which these money sharks will go to hound their victims, I insert the following letter from Patrick H. Loughram, an attorney at law, of Washington, D. C., to me. He states in part as follows:

As an attorney I have represented numerous unfortunate persons who have been at "the mercy of the Shylocks of trade." This quoted phrase is taken from the opinion of our court of appeals in Brown v. Slocum (30 App. D. C., 571), at page 581.

I recall now one unusually pathetic case, that of a poor devil now in the Government Asylum for the Insane, whose mental derangement was directly due to the hounding of him by an unconscionable money lender of this District. Even after this poor fellow was confined in the asylum the money lender started a systematic persecution of the wife. I had long before computed the amount due to the money lender and had made a tender of the amount due plus legal interest thereon. This was refused, but the money lender did not dare question in any legal proceeding the accuracy of the amount thus tendered. He held the note of the poor fellow who was confined in the asylum, and about 70 per cent of the amount of the note represented accumulated usurious interest. The money lender began harassing the wife by sending his collectors to her home and by threatening to remove her furniture. After investigation of the case I told her that the furniture was not subject to the chattel trust and advised her that in the event any of the collectors of this money lender ever again visited her to warn them to leave her home, and if they continued there after being warned to protect her home, even if in protecting it she would be obliged to take the life of the intruder. Thereafter one of the collectors did visit this woman, and after being warned to leave, refused to leave, and the little woman, acting on my advice, drove the scoundrel from her home at the muzzle of a revolver. Thereafter this money lender reported this woman to a credit agency, and the representative of this credit agency began to dun her. This credit agency sent to her a letter asking her to call at the office of the agency. When she did call she attempted to explain the situation, and her explanation was rejected, and she was then told that the agency would destroy her credit in the city and make it impossible for her to secure anything on credit until she had paid the usurious loan. After this interview the little woman came to me in tears. With her husband in an asylum, driven there through the hounding of usurers, and the little woman herself hysterical, you can readily imagine that the situation appealed to my sympathy.

Only to-day I settled a case with a money lender in this city who is ostensibly an attorney at law. The bar association should disbar the man, for it is obvious to everyone acquainted with him that he never practices law, but has done nothing else since he has been in business in Washington but practice usury. This fellow had secured the making of a note by a woman in the sum of $580, and had the note secured by a chattel trust on the woman's furniture. The woman received in cash only $400, the usurer pocketing the rest and telling her that she should regard the amount pocketed by him as a fee for his services as an attorney in connection with the loan and in connection with other matters. Under the chattel trust the usurer had provided that in the event of sale of the furniture 10 per cent of the proceeds of the sale should be paid to the trustee. This usurer named as trustee a young man scarcely 21 years of age and employed as a clerk in the office of the usurer. The $400 was given this woman about the 15th of November last. She found it impossible to make payments of the monthly installments, and being wholly without funds and desiring to secure enough money to meet her immediate needs, it was arranged that the furniture should be sold. The sale brought in, after deducting cost of publishing notice of the sale, auctioneer's commissions, the sum of $1,221.52. Bear in mind, now, that the usurer had given this woman only $400. If the usurer had been permitted to make settlement without the interposition of an attorney on behalf of the woman, the usurer would undoubtedly have deducted the full face of the note and also $163 as trustee's commissions, or in all the sum of $743. Of course, it goes without saying that the little office boy whom he had named as trustee would get none of the commissions due him under the sale, but that the commissions would be retained by the usurer. The usurer would then have received $743 in settlement of a loan of $400 made a little more than a month ago.

Mr. Speaker, the above are only a few of the many outrageous and sad cases that have come to the attention of the Committee on the District of Columbia during the consideration of this legislation. Washington, the home of the Government clerk, has been a fertile field for these money sharks. They have reaped millions of dollars from their nefarious business. I believe the enactment of the above law will put a stop to this and at the same time work as an example for the lawmaking bodies for the States and cities to follow, that this great evil may be suppressed all over the country.

Tuberculosis "Cures"—Dr. Friedman's and Other Serum Treatments.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. KINDRED,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 26, 1913.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as about one-tenth of all persons who die from all causes die from tuberculosis, and inasmuch as Dr. Friedman has arrived in this country claiming a wonderful tuberculosis treatment, and inasmuch as the suffering consumptives of this country should be warned against raising their hopes too high, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. KINDRED] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Speaker, nearly 25 years ago Prof. Koch, the eminent German physician, announced to the world that he had perfected a serum, obtained from cultures of the human tubercle bacilli, that would cure consumption or tuberculosis in the human being. He and his followers believed and claimed that his startling discovery would prove the specific and panacea that had been earnestly sought by medical men in all ages.

Millions all over the world, suffering from the dreaded white plague, which is responsible for the taking off of one-tenth of all who die from all causes, had their brightest hopes raised and quickly blasted—the spes phthisica, or abnormal hope, is a constant, prominent symptom of those having lung tuberculosis. However many the reasons for the failure of this heralded serum, the truth is that it failed, after thousands had been harmed by it and after many had died, after its injection, earlier than they otherwise would have done, because of the severe reaction incident to its injection into the blood current. In the light of the past 20 years of experiments with tubercular serums, leading to our present-day knowledge of this and other serum treatments—and brilliant scientific results have been obtained by Flexner and others in the serum treatment of many diseases regarded heretofore as incurable—we know that Koch's serum was too toxic or virulent, or, in other words, that the human tubercular bacilli cultures from which it was prepared were not sufficiently attenuated; hence the immediate bad effects on the patient or the dangerous "reactions" from its use.

Many laboratory workers among the hundreds of physicians in this country and in Europe who make tuberculosis their exclusive specialty have endeavored, especially during the past 15 years, to overcome these very faults of Koch's original serum, and it has been demonstrated, especially by Dr. Charles C. Browning, of Los Angeles, Cal., and others, more on the Pacific coast than in the Eastern States, that they had overcome these dangers in the serum now successfully and extensively used by them in the worst stages of consumption. So much by way of introduction to Dr. Friedman's methods of treatment and the reasons he assigns for them—an introduction that is intended to lay emphasis on the fact that many others have worked on the same theory to accomplish what Dr. Friedman and his friends claim he has accomplished.

I will give verbatim the report of our American consul general, Mr. A. M. Thackara, which gives briefly the facts connected with the first announcement of the treatment by Dr. Friedman, as follows:

REPORT OF THE FRIEDMAN CURE FOR TUBERCULOSIS.

AMERICAN CONSULATE GENERAL,
Berlin, Germany, December 31, 1912.

The SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: On November 6 last Dr. Friedrich Franz Friedman, of Berlin, in a lecture delivered before the Berlin Medical Society (Berliner medizinische Gesellschaft) announced that he has discovered a remedy for tuberculosis. The treatment consists in the injection of a solution prepared by the doctor himself, which he claims contains living nonvirulent bacilli taken from cold-blooded animals in contradistinction to the virulent organisms contained in Koch's Tuberkulin and other tuberculosis remedies. Up to November 18 last Dr. Friedman claims to have treated 1,182 cases, mostly children, and that the inoculation has proved a success.

In the discussions which followed the lecture some of the most prominent Berlin physicians expressed their surprise at the favorable results obtained by Dr. Friedman in his treatment of their tuberculosis patients. Other doctors claimed that equally favorable results have been obtained by the Koch and other tuberculosis cures. It is the consensus of opinion of the Berlin medical profession that the results of the new treatment can not be definitely acknowledged till facilities have been offered to the various physicians to observe the effects of the preparation under their own administrations and then only after sufficient time has elapsed to determine whether or not the cures or the instances of amelioration of the condition of the patient are permanent. Owing to the comparatively short period which has elapsed since the new treatment has been tried fears have been expressed lest the nonvirulent organisms when injected into the human system may not become virulent and cause an outbreak of the disease.

Dr. Friedman has stated that at present the new preparation can not be given to the medical profession at large, as he has not the proper facilities for the manufacture of the remedy, but as soon as possible the solution will be furnished to medical experts to enable them to administer the cure to their own patients.

In answer to a request for information made recently by this consulate general, Dr. Friedman replied as follows:

"My remedy for the time being has not yet been given out to anyone. For the present, patients will be treated only under my personal direction in my Institute for Tuberculosis and Scrofulosis, at 49 Lutzowstrasse, Berlin. I am unable to say just yet how soon my remedy will be available in America.

"My institute is not a hospital, but room and board may be had elsewhere in Berlin at usual prices by those who come for treatment.

"It is impossible to give an estimate of length of time necessary for treatment without examination. Where cases are not too far advanced treatment usually covers a period of several weeks."

The following is an opinion of the new remedy given by one of the local physicians:

"In November of this year Dr. Friedman delivered a lecture to the Berlin Medical Association, in which he announced that he had discovered a new preparation for the treatment of tuberculosis. In his lecture he stated that the new remedy would not only cure cases of tuberculosis which were already well defined, but also that he could prevent the disease by inoculation, especially in small children. There already exists up to the present time various preparations which we call 'sera,' by the injection of which tuberculosis has been fought. The first serum was made by the celebrated Robert Koch and consisted of dead tuberculosis bacilli. The other preparations which have appeared since were also obtained by the emulsion of dead tuberculosis bacilli. The preparation of Dr. Friedman consists of living nonvirulent bacilli taken from cold-blooded animals, such as turtles; that is to say, of living tuberculosis bacilli which have lost their virulence or poisonous quality if injected into the human body.

"Friedman claimed that he has treated many hundred cases by himself and with the assistance of several Berlin physicians and has had a great success. The cases which he presented to the Berlin Medical Association showed, indeed, a great improvement, but that the cures are permanent can only be determined in the future. It is certain that similar success has been obtained with other preparations, therefore it is very difficult to give a definite opinion as to the new discovery; first, because Dr. Friedman does not specify the method by which his preparation is made, and, secondly, because he has not given his material to other doctors to enable them to prove his statements. In all events, the medical profession is very skeptical in regard to this cure, as Friedman uses living or even weakened tuberculosis bacilli, and nobody can state with certainty at this time that these bacilli, if injected into the human body, do not become virulent. My opinion is as follows:

"It is very possible that successful results have actually been obtained by the use of the Friedman preparation, but before the results can be accepted as definite by the medical profession at large, it will be necessary to have an experience with the preparation for several years by other doctors besides Dr. Friedman. Under the present conditions I, as well as many other doctors, would abstain from treatment with the new preparation."

Copies of the Berliner Klinische Wochenschrift are forwarded as annexes to this report. In No. 47, of November 18, 1912, on pages 2214 to 2217, the lectures of Dr. Friedman are given in the original text, and on pages 2241 to 2246 the discussion which followed the lecture. In No. 49, of December 2, 1912, on pages 2329 to 2335, the discussion is concluded.

A. M. THACKARA,
American Consul General.

Dr. Friedman claims, then, to have perfected an absolute specific by the inoculation of the living nonvirulent germs of human tuberculosis, the solution being prepared by first inoculating turtles or other cold-blooded animals with human tubercle bacilli in contradistinction to the virulent organisms contained in Koch's and other tubercular serums.

To quote, in part, the words of Dr. Friedman on the occasion of his first public announcement of his serum and his claims of cures, made in a lecture, November 6, 1912, before the Berlin (Germany) Medical Society, he states, what I have already pointed out as the tendency of present-day investigation, as follows:

However, in all processes hitherto used for the production of tuberculosis matter the basic material used was the virulent and strongly toxic bacilli of human tuberculosis or bovine tuberculosis, which in spite of all efforts to remove their poisonousness by special processes naturally continued to be capable of seriously injuring or at least endangering the organism.

Moreover these drastic processes injured the extremely delicate antigenes—that is, the substances which are capable of forming the specific antibodies—which were contained in the bacillus. The task therefore arose of finding as a remedy a substance which should be harmless, even in large doses, and which should possess as far as possible all the specific properties of the exciter, except its toxicalness (toxicity) and virulence. There would have to be a bacillus which was naturally unvirulent and untoxical, both in the individual having tuberculosis and in the one that is free therefrom. It was necessary that the bacillus should be a living one, for any method of killing them, even though apparently the mildest, naturally impairs the finest molecular constitution of the bacillus organism.

If all these considerations were correct, then a substance suited to the cure of tuberculosis must fulfill the following requirements: It must consist of genuine, living tuberculosis bacilli, naturally and absolutely unvirulent and free from any additions or disturbances.

Surely every qualified physician who has studied the serum treatment of tuberculosis will admit that Dr. Friedman has here laid down the underlying principles that might, subject to a long and thorough clinical test, constitute a safe and possibly a curative serum in this disease.

But it must be borne in mind that other serum products, such as those made and extensively employed by Dr. Carl von Rucke, Asheville, N. C., and many others to be mentioned later, and some of which do not fulfill the requirements of Dr. Friedman, have proven useful and may have as many cures to their credit as has Dr. Friedman's.

I have personally known of many consumptives, some in the advanced and seemingly hopeless stages, who have been cured by Dr. Von Rucke's and other modified, attenuated serum treatments, always administered with care and full appreciation of the danger of too violent reaction.

Quoting Dr. Friedman further, he says:

The preparation proved absolutely harmless, even in large doses and however applied, whether subcutaneously, intramuscularly, intravenously, per os, conjunctively, or locally on an open tuberculosis nidus. The treatment consists in intramuscular incorporation occurring once, twice, or three times, seldom oftener, and repeated at long intervals. Success or failure depends on the complete resorption of the preparation. An infiltrate must form at the place of injection; this infiltrate should be from the size of a walnut to that of a small apple, and will gradually disappear in the course of the next few weeks or months. As long as this tissue exists, and during its gradual resorption, the healing will go on.

Only if and as long as the injected substance is completely absorbed and remains in the body do the healing effects appear most strikingly; as a rule this occurs very soon, and the healing then progresses steadily. We often see, even under the influence of a single injection, bone and joint fistulas of long years' standing become clean and close, while scrofuloderms are covered over with young and healthy skin; big, hard, glandular tumors diminish considerably in size; tubercular abscesses flatten down and cicatrize; chronic scrofulous eczema heals permanently; and, last but not least, pulmonary consumptives lose all their troubles and physical symptoms of disease. However, if the resorption of the substance is incomplete, and if, after several weeks or sometimes even months, and for reasons difficult to ascertain, the deposit at the place of injection "melts away" or begins to secrete, or if the body rids itself thereof in the form of an abscess, the healing often, if not always, ceases and nothing would be accomplished in such cases even by a renewed injection; on the contrary, the patient would simply be given a new infiltrate and a new abscess without being benefited.

In this way I have formerly often had failures, or at least not complete but only partial success at healing.

Why is it, now, that many patients, in spite of strenuous physical labor, assimilate the substance smoothly and without a drop of secretion, healing promptly and perfectly, while others, in spite of physical repose, even when remaining in bed, and, of course, in spite of absolute asepsis at the time of injection, continue to receive inflamed and separating infiltrates? Must we content ourselves here with the conventional phrase that all persons simply do not react alike, that one has more propensity toward the formation of abscesses than another, etc., or are there not causes here of a very specific nature, inasmuch as a very specific disease process is influenced by a very specific living agent?

Gentlemen, far be it from me to conceal the great defects of method and the difficulties which formerly existed herein, for it required years of patient observation before I was able to procure any light on this subject. Even though, as a matter of course, it is not possible to force all cases of so changeable a disease as tuberculosis into a rigid system of rules and categories, nevertheless an abundance of observations has afforded certain important facts as a valuable starting point. Thus I found that in cases in which the Pirquet tuberculin reaction usually has a negative, or almost negative, result—that is, cases of phthisis of a progressive character, severe or manifold bone tuberculosis, and, generally speaking, progressive tuberculosis already propagated through the blood—there is, without exception, a rapid and complete resorption at the first injection, with only a slight and transient infiltrate formation. Not until the first or second injection does specific hypersensitiveness occur in such cases in the form of considerable infiltrates. If, on the contrary, the cutaneous reaction is strongly positive, and if the case is not a very mild one, complete therapeutic success will not be attained with a simple subcutaneous or intramuscular injection.

I should like to remark here parenthetically that, though the cutaneous reaction may be utilized as an index, or at least as a starting point, this does not mean that tuberculin, or one of its components (albumen, neutral fat, fatty acid lipoid, poison), is the sole or chief bearer of the hypersensitiveness, or that other substances formed from the virulent tubercle bacilli inside or outside the human organism are not these bearers, or that perhaps even the tuberculin reactions in different individuals are not due to different causes even if they do not manifest themselves in the same manner clinically and biologically.

Gentlemen, after the substance has been incorporated intravenously (in which case it is borne without difficulty even in large doses, except that there is a transient fever and feeling of fatigue), there is, to be sure, a temporary success, accompanied by a rapid healing. For instance, lupus centers which have existed for decades diminish in size and intensity after a few days. Then, however, the healing process comes to an absolute standstill as if cut off.

But still another considerable difficulty arose in the subsequent treatment of these cases which had been preliminarily treated intravenously with a comparatively large dose. As a matter of fact, they had acquired so complete a dissolving power with respect to the substance itself through this intravenous treatment that large doses, administered subcutaneously or intramuscularly, were immediately dissolved without any appreciable infiltrates and therefore any considerable therapeutic effects resulting.

I now thought of uniting the advantages afforded by each individual mode of incorporation by combining these modes. Indeed, the results with this simultaneous method were that the abscesses are entirely avoided here, that beautiful and gradually well resorbed infiltrates are formed, and that accordingly the therapeutic results may be characterized as very favorable. Perhaps the simultaneous method may be used in future to advantage even in other branches of therapeutics.

Gentlemen, the sovereign form of application of the substance in question is and remains the subcutaneous or intramuscular. This form alone corresponds to the eminently chronic character of the origin of tuberculosis and of its cure, which can naturally also only take place gradually. The only purpose of combination with the intravenous treatment should be to render the body capable of receiving the subcutaneous treatment.

It is also possible to break the specific hypersensitiveness in a purely subcutaneous manner, namely, by intermittent treatment with certain specific bacilli products made by myself.

Let us now consider the results in external—that is, bone and joint—tuberculosis.

In this connection it should be noted that in the cases in which the preparation was resorbed and a cure effected no relapse has occurred. It is therefore not a question here of what is often called a cure of fistula, consisting of the fact that the fistulas temporarily cease to secrete and perhaps even superficially close together, but nevertheless remain bluish red, swollen, and somewhat sensitive to pressure; on the contrary, firm scars are formed which gradually grow pale and are devoid of sensitiveness. With the exception of a hopeless case in which the pelvis was totally destroyed, of peritonitis and severe amyloid, as well as of two old women 75 years of age who had dry brittle caries, all of the 12 cases of bone fistula treated by me were cured.

In a specially severe case of fungous knee-joint fistula, in which the leg was to be amputated (original circumference of knee 32 cm., healthy knee 28 cm.; present circumference of knee 28 cm., healthy knee 28 cm.), all of the six unctuous deep fistulas were cleanly cured after two injections. The knee became absolutely devoid of pain and the boy had his leg preserved, a result which even in the opinion of Prof. Erich Muller, who had referred the patient to me, could not have been attained by any other method of treatment.

Gentlemen, tuberculosis is a constitutional infectious disease of the human race which is at least as various in its forms as lues. If a person has once been infected with the luetic poison, we physicians assume—and often perhaps rightly—that eruptions of the skin which are difficult to heal, insignificant fissures, oft-recurring neuralgic troubles, depression of spirits, and many, many other things, are traceable to the old infection. Accordingly, in the case of a person who has once been infected with tubercular poison—and, according to the indication of the Pirquet reactions, this includes many though by no means all adults—we must always assume a connection with the old tubercular infection where lues may with certainty be left out of account, and we shall generally hit it right in so doing. As is known, Poncet described a tubercular joint rheumatism, of which we here see a cured case. In diabetes likewise such coincidences or rather connections have long been known. The phenomena thus indirectly connected with tuberculosis might be designated as para or meta tuberculosis. Credit is due to our colleague, Karfunkel, for having called attention in the rich material of his polyclinic, to the fact that in Pirquet-positive persons the apparently most heterogeneous phenomena—for instance, cases of ischias and other neuralgias and chronic joint pains which had existed for years and been treated in vain, as well as mental depression, notably children—heal or are materially improved by the use of the remedy, which strikes at the tubercular basis itself. (Three cases are shown.)

Gentlemen, the connection of lues with insanity is now recognized. In pursuance of the idea just explained, I had occasion to perform the Pirquet reaction in a psychiatric clinic on 18 insane persons who were free from lues, there being 7 cases of imbecility, 5 of paranoia, 3 of dementia præcox, and 3 of catatonia, and I observed that the cutaneous reaction was of an excessively high degree in 11 instances. Large, painful infiltrates over the size of a dollar developed, such as I had never seen in a total of 2,000 reactions performed by me. Perhaps there is some kind of connection here as yet unexplained.

Besides the morbid conditions caused by the tubercle bacillus, it might possibly be that those two infectious diseases whose determining factors (exciters) resemble the tubercle bacillus in the system would be accessible to some extent through this specific method of treatment. I refer to leprosy and actinomycosis. I shall revert further on to this latter disease, which seldom occurs in man. I have made four injections in lepers, one being intramuscular and the other three simultaneous, and the results have induced me to repeat the experiments on a broader scale. I shall refrain, for the time being, from making any report on the observations made in connection with leprosy.

Gentlemen, I now come to the second part of my lecture. Prophylaxy is, generally speaking, a more grateful and easy task than therapy. Immunizing and curing processes go hand in hand throughout bacteriotherapy. After the preparation had proved harmless in the broadest sense in both man and beast, and after the progressive and lasting cures it made were beyond question, I used the remedy on children by way of prophylactic inoculation. Up to the present 335 children ranging from 1 hour to 3 years of age, and including 305 sucklings, have been inoculated. The inoculation consists of a single intramuscular injection. In almost all cases the cutaneous reaction was performed, being frequently repeated, and in about 2 per cent of the newborn babes it was positive; often the pricking reaction was also applied. In all cases the hereditary conditions with respect to tuberculosis were thoroughly investigated, and the cutaneous reaction was also applied on the mothers, being positive in 90 per cent of the cases. When Chief Physician Prof. Erich Müller had been convinced of the absolute harmlessness of the preparation and of the excellent results on the 53 children kindly turned over to me by him, Dr. Pulvermacher placed at my disposal the rich supply of sucklings in the large lying-in hospital under his management. After he had also become permanently convinced of the success of the inoculations and of the excellent subsequent development of the children, a large number of children at the polyclinic of Dr. Barfunkel were given an injection.

Of course, an accurate record is constantly kept of each one of the children inoculated. If the child lives in or within a few miles of Berlin, it is regularly examined by several physicians. Up to the present, although the inoculations date back over one year in the oldest series, not even the slightest sign of incipient scrofula or tuberculosis, in spite of the prophylactic inoculation, has appeared in a single instance.

I preferred children of tubercular environment for the prophylactic inoculation. Often both parents had tuberculosis, while brothers or sisters already suffered or had died from the disease. In the case of newborn twins I always inoculated only one, leaving the other uninoculated. All the sucklings without a single exception stood the inoculation well, and, as sucklings usually do not as yet have any specific hypersensitiveness, they also had no fever. A few days after the inoculation an infiltrate about the size of a pea to a cherry is formed, but it disappears after a few weeks without leaving any trace. During the existence of the infiltrate the Pirquet reaction is positive, appearing usually on and after the fifth day. After the resorption of the infiltrate the Pirquet becomes negative. Whether tuberculin hypersensitiveness and immunity from tuberculosis are coincident is still an open question. Much inclines to answer this question in the affirmative, while F. Klemperer, whose rabbits lost their tuberculine hypersensitiveness after their tuberculosis breeding center had been extirpated, but retained their resistance to tuberculosis, inclines to answer it in the negative. In several cases I found that newborn infants afflicted hereditarily with tuberculosis had a pronouncedly positive Pirquet at birth, and that this Pirquet became plainly negative several months after immunization.

After having carefully read every word of Dr. Friedman's address, of which the foregoing is a small part, on the first announcement of his serum, I particularly am struck by his repeated statements that consumptives or patients suffering from lung tuberculosis, even in the most advanced stages, who received his treatment, did not have to remain in bed, but were allowed to walk about and perform their usual labor during the whole course of treatment. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that his serum will accomplish all that has been claimed for it, I am sure that few physicians understanding the true nature, pathology, symptoms, and course of this disease will agree with him that it would be possible for such patients to undergo much physical exertion, especially during the administration of such a constitutional or systemic remedy. Any remedy potent enough to kill the germs of this disease must be followed by some constitutional depression.

I am impressed also by the complete absence of any advice by Dr. Friedman to his patients while undergoing treatment to make every effort, in addition to his serum therapy, to upbuild their bodily strength and general health. Surely it would appear strange that he, although believing implicitly in his own discovery, would completely ignore the importance to such patients of keeping up, to the limit, the old-fashioned plan of giving under all conditions, in these cases, regulated but plentiful albuminous and mixed food, an abundance of out-door air in a dry, equable climate, and the observance of strict hygienic measures which have in the past, and will in the future, prove of the utmost value in the administration of serotherapy or any other treatment.

A notable fact bearing on the spontaneous curability (the natural healing tendency in nature) of thousands of cases of lung tuberculosis is the fact that healed and completely cured tubercular lesions are found in the lungs of thousands of persons, on autopsy, who have died from other causes, and who did not, in life, know of the existence of this disease. It is my duty to add in this connection that, regardless of serum treatment, thousands of valuable lives could be saved if the general practitioner, all over the world, could and would learn and employ the modern methods of early diagnosis of tuberculosis of the lungs and other organs. In this early stage it is most curable, and, in many cases, is entirely incurable in the later stages, by any known treatment.

Referring to the views of others as to the value of serotherapy, I can not do better than to refer to a well-known work on tuberculosis by a distinguished American author, Arnold C. Klebs, M. D., who says of serotherapy: "Passive immunization by means of serums of treated animals has been attempted by many, more especially since Behring's and Roux's successful work in diphtheria. The first work was naturally with the serums of animals immune to tuberculosis, which Bouchard (1892) by experiments on guinea pigs showed of little value. This again turned attention to organotherapy, which in turn was supplanted by the use of serums of artificially immunized animals. The first work along these lines was that by Auclair (1896), who immunized fowls to human tubercle bacilli, but obtained no antitoxic serum. Following this, many attempts have been made to obtain such a serum, but to-day, while several men claim to have such a serum, they have so far been unable to establish their claims.

The amount of work and literature upon this subject is overwhelming, and can only be touched on briefly.

Among the animals used for the production of an immune serum are fowls, the horse, mule, ass, goat, dog, sheep, and cattle (milk). These animals have been inoculated with many products mentioned under hemotherapy and organotherapy, with tubercle bacilli, virulent and attenuated by many means (long growth, passage through refractory animals, glycerin, heat, decomposition, sputum treated with phenol, etc.) of all strains, human, bovine, avian, and cold-blooded; with many varieties of tuberculin (O. T. T. R. B. E.) Beraneck's, etc., with acid-resisting bacilli (timothy hay).

Varieties.—The immunizing serums in use at present have dwindled down to very few. Those most used are Marmorek's ('03, '04, '05) and Maragliano's, but de Schweinitz, Fisch, Paquin, Arloing, Baumgarten, von Behring, have also worked on serums. Monard, Blache, and others have prepared and used artificial serums; others have combined iodoform and guaiacol with serums. The serum of the normal horse and the diphtheria-antitoxic serum have been advocated. The milk of immunized animals (cows, chiefly) has also been employed.

I quote from another eminent American author and specialist on tuberculosis, my friend, Francis M. Pottenger, A. M., M. D., LL. D., Monrovia, Cal., in his recent noted work on the treatment of pulmonary tuberculosis. He says, relative to the serum therapy in tuberculosis:

> The serum which is best known in the treatment of tuberculosis is the antitoxic serum of Maragliano. There is one respect in which Maragliano's products differ from those of others—they contain no preservative. Even the products which he uses for injection into animals for the production of the sera are free from preservatives. In this way he aims to introduce the toxins of the bacillus in their natural form in the form in which they are found in the bacilli themselves. It should further be added that neither the bacilli nor their products made from them are subjected to heat.
> This antitoxic serum is made in the following manner: Animals, preferably horses, are subjected to increasing doses of a watery extract of tubercle bacilli until their blood shows a high content in antitoxic units. The animal is then bled and the serum prepared under strict asepsis for use upon the human being.
> The watery extract used is made as follows: The bodies of tubercle bacilli are extracted with warm distilled water until they are deprived of their toxic power. It is then standardized so that one cubic centimeter of extract will kill 100 germs of healthy guinea pig within three days.
> Recently Maragliano has produced another remedy which he calls bacteriolysin. For the preparation of this serum the goat is preferred, because it responds better to the inoculations. Bacteriolysin, according to Maragliano, contains not only antitoxins but agglutinins and bacteriolysins as well.
> It is produced by the inoculation of the animal with bacillus pulp, which is a product made by triturating living, highly virulent tubercle bacilli with fine sand in distilled water until the bodies of the bacilli are thoroughly destroyed. This process also mechanically separates the fat. It is then filtered through a Chamberlain filter to remove the bodies of the bacilli. To be sure that no virulent bacilli remain, a culture is taken. This preparation contains a maximum amount of bacilli substance and is unchanged by heat or preservatives.
> Marmorek's serum has enjoyed a good reputation among some men who are well qualified to give an opinion. Recently he has produced a new serum which contains protective bodies, not only against tubercle vacilli, but against the streptococcus which is so frequently found producing an accompanying mixed infection.

And so there is no end of serums.

If, as Dr. Friedman claims, he has perfected a serum that can be administered freely to children and adults without the slightest danger, and with numbers of brilliant cures, surely he has given to a suffering world the greatest blessing that could be wrung from the hidden recesses of science. He and his so-called cure have been much discussed of late in the sensational press, and he and his methods have been both defended and repudiated. While Dr. Friedman day before yesterday loudly proclaimed at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel, in New York City, that he was not commercial and that he would not accept the $1,000,000 offer of Banker Finley if he would cure 95 per cent of all consumptives that Mr. Finley might select, yet he has not denied the universally printed statement that he, as a regular ethical physician, had patented his discovery in all the larger European countries. This, taken in connection with other circumstances that have colored this whole matter with the suggestion of cheap and unethical advertising of a cure which, if it can stand the only test—the test of clinical experience in thousands of tuberculosis cases—would need no other advertising than such a test would give it throughout the whole world, would lead all thoughtful persons to go slow in forming a final judgment in such an important matter, of which the layman necessarily has little knowledge at present.

On the other hand, Dr. Friedman's action in turning over some of his serum to the United States Public Health Service, under Surg. Gen. Dr. Rupert Blue, is in keeping with that humane and professional conduct to be commended by all humanitarians and ethical physicians. This test will commence in the city of Washington this week, and at the same time will go on in New York City, and possibly in other parts of the country. It is my object here, as a physician, under all the existing conditions known especially to the medical profession, to call attention to and to emphasize the significant advice given to both poor and rich consumptives—whose confidence and high hope are only too easily aroused—by the Medical Association of the District of Columbia and by other advanced medical societies throughout the United States, and that is, to await and suspend judgment until a serum of this nature can be systematically tried first in the hands of the best qualified physicians, trained in this special clinical and laboratory work.

Panama Canal.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THETUS W. SIMS,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 26, 1913.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I take the floor to read into the RECORD a number of clippings, giving editorial expression of opinion held by many newspapers, and extracts from letters of well-known men throughout the length and breadth of the country, as to the wrong and evil of exempting our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls for the use of the Panama Canal:

[Life, New York.]

About the canal rates, we don't remember to have seen it said that the real purpose of the free tolls to coastwise ships provision was not to evade our treaty obligations, but to deceive the American people. The purpose was to give the coastwise ships a subsidy and help them beat all the transcontinental railroads on through traffic. That is not contrary to the treaties. But because our people hate the name of "subsidy" the gratuity was called "free tolls," a name quite as distasteful to the treaties as "subsidy" is to the people. Now, if we must take this dose, can't the doctors of legislation find a name for it that will not be obnoxious either to the treaties or the people?

[Rev. Joseph May, Philadelphia, Pa.]

I am earnestly in favor of the repeal by Congress of the provision in the Panama Canal bill exempting from tolls the vessels of the United States. Our national honor calls for such repeal. A wise expediency equally demands it. Public sentiment, irrespective of party sympathies, demands it with apparently a greater unanimity than has perhaps ever been manifested on a question of national policy.

February 13, 1913, the New York Chamber of Commerce, after full discussion, by a vote of 332 to 8, indorsed the repeal of the exemption of American coastwise shipping from Panama tolls.

[W. W. Seymour, mayor, Tacoma, Wash.]

I wish to be quoted, if at all, as an individual and not as mayor of this city. I took the liberty of writing President Taft last summer, protesting against what seemed to me a very headstrong and unreasonable policy which the Government was pursuing in refusing to submit the exemption of our coastwise steamers through the Panama Canal to arbitration.

I hope and pray that they will be exempted. I might say that probably no other section of the country would be as much benefited as the timber industry. Personally, I own considerable timber land, which would undoubtedly produce several hundred million feet of timber, and the free passage of coastwise steamers through the canal would be a very great personal advantage to me. But I never yet have made my money by going back on a deal, which it really seems to me the United States Government is aiming to do. However this may be, we should not refuse to arbitrate, and it ought not to be beyond the range of possibility to have this fairly and honestly determined.

I certainly think that this country would lose a great deal of prestige abroad unless we do, not only on the merits of the question itself, but from the fact that no other country has been so insistent upon the matter of arbitration as we and our influence in this direction, consequently the principle of arbitration in general would be very greatly handicapped.

[Arthur L. Weatherly, secretary Nebraska Society, Lincoln, Nebr.]

Personally my conviction is that the sacredness of contracts lies at the very heart of civilization. If a nation sets the example of violating a contract, what can be expected from the individual citizen? The provision exempting the coastwise trade of the United States from the payment of tolls is a direct breach of contract.

[Samuel Bulkley Griffin, Springfield Republican, Springfield, Mass.]

The Republican has steadily opposed, upon grounds of national honor, the proposed repeal of the "coastwise exemption" in the Panama bill. I inclose one of the editorials which deals with a particular phase of the question.

Extract from editorial: "Is exemption of the monopolistic coastwise shipping from the payment of canal tolls, while our shipping in the foreign trade must pay, anything but a species of graft? The exemption clause should be repealed."

[C. F. Hildreth, Freeport, Ill.]

We ought, in my judgment, to repeal this feature of the law, but if Congress can not be induced to do this, I can see no valid reason for refusing to arbitrate, and when we arbitrate we shall be defeated, as we ought to be.

[William Frederic Bade, Berkeley, Cal.]

It seems incredible that any Congress should have so stultified itself as to pass a bill that directly contravenes the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

[T. Clinton Brockway, Butte, Mont.]

The immediate repeal of the "coastwise exemption" bill is all that can save our reputation for good faith in international relations.

[Minneapolis Journal.]

We should do far better to repeal this provision ourselves and have the credit of being sensitive to our obligations than to arbitrate and lose a contention that is untenable. But worst of all would be to keep the free-tolls provision and to refuse arbitration on the ground that it was nobody's business what we did with our own canal, and that as far as treaties were concerned we could construe them to suit ourselves.

[R. I. Hamilton, superintendent of public schools, Vincennes, Ind.]

I am heartily in favor of the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal bill exempting the coastwise trade of the United States from paying the tolls. In my judgment it is clearly a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. "Uncle Sam's" word ought to be good always and everywhere. Again, it is not fair to give one set of traders an advantage over all others.

[R. M. Johnston, Trinity College, Durham, N. C.]

I am in sympathy with your movement to get the provision for American coastwise vessels to pass through the Panama Canal with tolls repealed.

[William C. Gilman, Norwich Town, Conn.]

The disgraceful canal bill ought to be repealed.

[Advocate of Peace, Washington, D. C.]

The wisest course would, we think, be for Congress to rescind its action with regard to coastwise ships, as this action was on other grounds unwise and indefensible. If this course can not be taken, then there is but one way out of the difficulty—that of arbitration.

[The New York Times.]

We hold that the best way to deal with the toll act is to repeal it, since either as a piece of domestic legislation or in its bearing on our international obligations it is indefensible, tricky, and wholly mischievous. Its repeal is the only way in which the Democratic Party in Congress can show its fidelity to the principles of the party, and the only way in which the party can show its respect for the good taste of the Nation.

[Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Free Synagogue, New York.]

To those who urge that the coastwise trade can not afford to pay tolls, we answer that we can very much less afford to break our troth. Our representatives in Congress must not be suffered to disregard national pledges and the mandates of national honor. In the matter of international relations a democracy must lift itself to the level of the highest moral obligation. It may or may not be true that a king can do no wrong, but a democracy will do wrong unless it will to do the right. If we as a Nation insist upon violating the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we are ignoring a solemn compact and violating a plighted troth.

[F. K. Sturgis, New York.]

I am strongly in favor of Mr. ROOT'S proposed action. I heartily indorse the resolutions passed by the New York Chamber of Commerce.

[William D. Sloane, New York.]

Our Congress should without hesitation act at once in the bill introduced by Senator ROOT and place our country in the position it should occupy as willing to carry out the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The passage of the bill exempting coastwise commerce was an error, and our Congress should recognize that fact by recalling it. The honor and integrity of our country is at stake.

At a meeting of the chamber of commerce held yesterday its members were almost unanimous in voting their approval of the resolutions submitted in favor of the repeal of this coastwise exemption.

[Knickerbocker Press, Albany, N. Y.]

The Democratic majority in the assembly, without intelligent debate, has voted to put its seal of approval upon the iniquitous and indefensible Panama Canal toll measure. This action was taken in such a manner as to command about as much respect as the adoption of a similar resolution by the Bumblebee Corners Whist Club. Probably not a baker's dozen of the Democratic majority know anything of the provisions of the Panama Canal tolls measure, to say nothing of having even a smattering of knowledge of the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Somebody told the Democratic majority to take action commending the measure, and it did without either collective or individual thought. In like manner are most of our measures of misrule enacted. Legislators under the lash of the party whip become mere rubber stamps to execute the will of the boss.

[Resolution of the Peace Society, Chicago, Ill.]

Resolved, That in view of the fact that many loyal and thoughtful American citizens fear that the exemption of American ships using the Panam Canal from paying the tolls imposed on foreign ships may be a breach of treaty obligation: Therefore the Chicago Peace Society hereby respectfully petitions the Members of the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States to submit the question to international arbitration unless the said enactment is rescinded.

[The Methodist Episcopal Ministerial Association, of Cincinnati.]

At its meeting on February 9 a resolution was adopted favoring the repeal of the Panama Canal tolls exemption act.

[Jacob Haussling, mayor of Newark, N. J.]

The plighted faith of the United States should be maintained at all hazards and at all sacrifice, and our honesty manifested to our own people and to the civilized world. I therefore unhesitatingly favor the repeal of the provision exempting the coastwise trade of the United States from Panama Canal tolls.

Should repeal be impossible for any reason the controversy should unquestionably be submitted to arbitration whatever results might be apprehended.

[Rev. Arthur H. Winn, Providence, R. I.]

Let us do nothing as a Nation that will injure our influence in the peace conference of the world. Let us repeal the questionable provision of the Panama Canal bill or arbitrate. Better is it to repeal.

[Isaac N. Seligman, New York.]

There can be little doubt in the mind of any fair-minded man who carefully reads the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that we are obligated to treat all vessels on an equality. We must not quibble and, like shrewd and cunning lawyers, endeavor to place our own construction on clear and simple words.

The spirit of the agreement is as unmistakable as the letters of the alphabet. If we have made a poor bargain—which I absolutely deny—let us, like honest men, abide by the terms and not stain the sacred honor and good name of our country.

[Right Rev. Joseph Schrembs, bishop of Toledo, Ohio.]

The exemption of coastwise shipping from the canal toll, while it does not in any sense build up an American merchant service, but simply fattens the purse of a few individuals, does fasten upon us as a Nation the stigma of petty unfairness toward the nations of the world. The provision, to my mind, ought to be repealed. It was passed under a misapprehension of true conditions.

I can not see that anything will be gained in the granting of exemptions to coastwise vessels, and trust that the repeal of that provision will be accomplished.

[G. Kampmeire, Iowa City, Iowa.]

I think we can not get out of the question honorably unless we submit it to arbitration, having once entered into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I suppose we must stick to our word.

[Rev. John Haynes Holmes, New York, N. Y.]

I believe that the coastwise exemption clause in the Panama Canal bill should be immediately repealed in the name of common decency and national honor. The compact in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is as clear as crystal on this point, and the action of Congress, therefore, a violation of treaty obligations of the most flagrant description. Seldom, if ever, has the United States been placed in a more threatening position before the world of nations than by this action, which was prompted by nothing other than a shameful conspiracy of greed, "jingo" patriotism, and moral effrontery. The country's conscience must now assert itself and see that this grievous mistake is speedily rectified.

[Rev. George R. Thayer, Cincinnati, Ohio.]

Concerning the clause in the Panama bill exempting our coastwise vessels from the toll paid by all other shipping, since it appears to be a rejection of our treaty with Great Britain, it would seem to be the honorable part, if our legislators doubt its being in violation of the treaty, to submit the matter to The Hague Tribunal, which our country had so large a part in creating. Aside from its relation to the treaty, I distrust the exemption because I see in it an indirect subsidy to certain shipowners, while the Nation thus far has steadfastly refused to offer premiums to domestic ownership of vessels. If we are to undertake any such "protection," it should be done frankly, and not by subterfuge.

[Charles A. Pfeiffer, mayor, St. Joseph, Mo.]

I believe that the repeal of the provision of the Panama Canal bill exempting the coastwise trade of the United States would enhance our reputation for fairness and justice.

[Clayton R. Bowen, theological school, Meadville, Pa.]

The "coastwise exemption" in the Panama Canal act should by all means be repealed. It is an absolutely clear case of our national honor being at stake. As one who wishes to respect his Government, I desire to be counted among those urging the repeal.

[Rev. James Huxtable, Boston, Mass.]

More important than the Panama Canal is our national honor. There is a widespread belief that we have made a mistake in the Panama Canal act. The manly way is to repeal it. If that can not be done, we are bound in honor to submit the matter to arbitration.

[Nebraska Peace Society, Lincoln, Nebr.]

The Nebraska Peace Society, at its annual meeting, the 16th of January, passed the following vote: "That the Nebraska Peace Society is in favor of either repeal of the provision to grant exemption of coastwise trade from tolls or the submission of the matter to The Hague Tribunal."

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. KNOWLAND,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 26, 1913,

On the bill (H. R. 28812) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which my colleague [Mr. RAKER] has just offered should be adopted. It provides that the U. S. S. Portsmouth be transferred to the State of California, without expense to the Government, upon condition that the State, through the legislature, accept this historic vessel. It is to remain the property of the State, which is to preserve and care for it for all time.

On May 29, 1911, the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, secured the passage of a bill introduced by him (S. 817) appropriating $25,000 for the repair of the Portsmouth in order to place the vessel in condition to make the trip to California. The bill came to the House and was referred to the House Committee on Naval Affairs, where it has rested since, that committee, following out the policy of this Congress in economizing on small items, while the larger ones slip through, refusing to report the bill, and it was only by agreeing that no expense should be borne by the Government that it was possible to obtain any congressional action.

The movement to preserve this famous ship, whose history is so intimately associated with the history of California, was started by the two orders of Native Sons and Native Daughters of the Golden West, of which first-named order I have the honor of being a past grand president. The Portsmouth was built at the Portsmouth Navy Yard in 1843. Her first cruise was in the Pacific in 1844–1848, under the command of Commander J. B. Montgomery, in the squadron of Commodore John Drake Sloat. She arrived in San Francisco on June 3, 1846, and on July 5 landed a party of seamen and marines for the protection of the American consul and citizens, under command of Lieut. J. S. Missroon, United States Navy, and Lieut. H. B. Watson, United States Marine Corps.

On July 9, 1846, a force was again landed from the Portsmouth, and on the public square of San Francisco, since known as Portsmouth Square, Commander Montgomery, supported by 70 seamen and marines, hauled down the Mexican colors, and, amid the cheers of the assembled people, ran up the American flag, a salute of 21 guns being fired from the vessels in the bay.

It would seem particularly fitting that this historic old ship be taken over by the State of California and during the Panama-Pacific International Exposition be anchored opposite the exposition grounds in San Francisco Bay.

The following is the record of the Portsmouth after her participation in the raising of the American flag in San Francisco Bay. It is from the records of the War Department, furnished by Charles W. Stewart, superintendent of library and naval war records:

March 11, 1847, to October 29, 1847, captured three Mexican vessels. Two of them were ransomed for $14,929.

February 24, 1848, sailed from Valparaiso; reached Boston May 5, 1848.

From 1849 to 1851, one of the African Squadron.

From 1851 to 1854, Pacific Squadron.

From 1856 to 1858, East India Squadron, under Commander A. H. Foote; took most prominent part in the capture and destruction of the Barrier Forts, Canton River, November 16–22, 1856. In this engagement there were 7 Americans killed and 22 wounded. The Portsmouth was struck by shot 12 times. At the close of the action she was given three rousing cheers by the crews of the British men-of-war lying near.

From 1859 to 1861, African Squadron; captured several slavers.

From 1861 to 1865, West Gulf Squadron; with Admiral Farragut, commanded by Commander S. Swartwout, at passage of Forts St. Phillip and Jackson, occupation of New Orleans, and numerous engagements in the lower Mississippi. Made a number of prizes.

In 1866, quarantine ship, New York Harbor.

In 1867 to 1868, fitting as a training ship and on special duty.

From 1869 to 1871, South Atlantic Squadron.

From 1872 to 1877, special service to Brazil and Pacific Squadron.

In 1877, training ship for boys, San Francisco.

In 1878, special service in connection with the Paris Exposition.

From 1879 to 1894, training ship for apprentices, Atlantic coast.

January 17, 1895, transferred by the Navy Department to the Naval Militia, State of New Jersey.

At the present date lying at the New York Navy Yard.

Total cost of building and repair to December 15, 1851, $313,632.33.

I predict that California will be glad to accept the Portsmouth and care for this historic ship. My State is proud of its history, and no Commonwealth has done more to preserve historic landmarks and suitably mark historic spots.

The Late Representative Wedemeyer.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. SMITH,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 16, 1913,

On House resolution 840, paying tribute to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM W. WEDEMEYER, late a Representative from Michigan.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, we are again forcibly reminded that in the midst of life we are in death.

The news of the taking away of our colleague, as conveyed to me by Senator TOWNSEND, was a great shock, for when I bade him good-by in this Chamber on the day he started for his home, to go, as he then expected, with his wife to Panama, he never seemed better or more full of cheer and hope.

It has been my good fortune to enjoy an intimate acquaintance with him for many years. I have long known his desire to be a Member of Congress, and it may be a surprise, even to some of his most intimate friends, to know that he was not enamored with congressional life, for he has often said to me during his term of service that he would be satisfied if he could serve another term, and I think, eminently satisfactory as his services were, he would have been content to retire at the end of another term, to engage not wholly in the practice of his profession—the law—but also to pursue his literary work and lecture, and in this he also would have been a pronounced success.

It is given to but few men to make a more enviable record than he has during his first term—faithful, honest, patient, and industrious; always courteous and kind.

His popularity was as wide as his acquaintance, which was extensive, and those of us who journeyed to his home city, Ann Arbor, January 26, witnessed an outpouring of the people in University Hall that was the highest evidence of his popularity and the esteem in which he was held by all classes of people, who gave touching and sincere proof of their great regard for their fellow citizen and honored Member of Congress.

His wife, children, and friends can console themselves in the years to come with the thought that our deceased brother lived up to the full measure of all his opportunities, and that the world is brighter and better for his having lived.

Friend and colleague, I bid you a last farewell, hoping we shall meet in the great beyond.

Naval Appropriation Bill.

OF

HON. WILLIAM S. VARE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 25, 1913.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as a Member of this House representing the great constituency of South Philadelphia, within which territory the Philadelphia Navy Yard is located, I want to thank the members of the Naval Affairs Committee for their prompt action in reporting favorably this appropriation of $15,000 for the drawing of plans for the 1,700-foot dry dock for the Philadelphia Navy Yard, thereby keeping faith with the promises made to the people of Philadelphia on their visit to that city on May 10 and 11, 1912, when the Committees on Naval Affairs and Rivers and Harbors were the guests of the city of Philadelphia.

In my opinion the committee has acted wisely, conscientiously, and for the best interests of the Government. Philadelphia and the State of Pennsylvania have been very modest in their demands for appropriations from the Federal Treasury, notwithstanding the fact that a large share of the revenues of the Government are produced by that great State. Philadelphia has done much to encourage the building of what is destined to be the greatest navy yard in this country. This tract of land was originally owned by the city and given to the United States Government, without any cost whatever, for the establishment of a naval station, and to my mind it is certainly up to the United States Government to give us appropriations sufficient for its proper development.

LOCATION.

The Philadelphia Navy Yard is situated at the junction of the Delaware and Schuylkill Rivers, forming the southern point of Philadelphia's 129 square miles of area. The site was formerly an island, but is now a part of the mainland through the artificial extension of South Broad Street across the back channel.

AREA.

Its peculiarly advantageous location gives to it a water area of 475¾ acres, with an additional land area of 447¼ acres. This total of 923 acres is said to be greater than the combined docks and yards of Great Britain, and it gives a river front so large that 7 vessels can be accommodated along the wharves in the Delaware, 12 battleships can be anchored off the yard in midstream without interfering with commerce, and the entire battleship fleet of the Navy could be put in reserve in the back channel. Its area is sufficient for all divisions of department work, and, in addition, 200 acres of land are reserved for housing and drilling the personnel of the yard, for recreation purposes, and for officers' quarters.

TACTICAL ADVANTAGES.

The Philadelphia Navy Yard is located 90 miles from the sea, on a fresh-water river that has a rise and fall of tide of only 6.2 feet. Vessels anchored or docked there are beyond the reach of salt water and the consequent danger to and deterioration of hulls due to marine growths. The Delaware River now has a channel of 30 feet to the sea, and Government provision has been made for a uniform depth of 35 feet. Its channel is so broad, so well marked and lighted, that a squadron of eight warships, sailing in divisions of four, can be docked or anchored off Philadelphia Navy Yard in from 10 to 12 hours after leaving open sea. Yet at the same time the Delaware River presents such excellent facilities for defensive armament that a foreign power would find it virtually impossible to attack a fleet anchored there. Any number of vessels might remain there indefinitely with inexhaustible supplies of food, coal, and skilled labor at hand.

PHYSICAL ADVANTAGES.

With respect to physical equipment and geographical location the Philadelphia Navy Yard is better fitted than any other United States navy yard for large or small repair work, and for these purposes it has now a good mechanical equipment, which, if supplemented by a proper modern dry dock, will make it superior in this last-named respect also. Here vessels can be anchored within 400 feet of the working quarters, while in other yards the anchorage is from 4 to 7 miles distant. Two great shipbuilding plants in the immediate vicinity maintain the reputation for building more steel tonnage than all the rest of the country combined, while one of the greatest ordnance factories in the world, the output of which is utilized by all the great European powers, is within the limits of the city.

DRY DOCKS.

The Philadelphia Navy Yard already possesses a dry dock large enough to handle the Minnesapolis, with a length of 414 feet and 59 feet beam, and has another dry dock that will accommodate the Utah, with a length of 522 feet and 80 feet beam. It expects to have, and should have, the greatest dry dock in the United States. It is ideally situated for such a dock to extend from the back channel to the Delaware River front. The possession of such a dry dock would prevent a repetition of the humiliating circumstances that developed in the summer of 1897, when the Indiana was damaged at sea. There being no dock large enough in the United States to accommodate her, it was necessary to send the battleship limping to Halifax for repairs, under the courtesy extended by England at that port.

The Philadelphia Navy Yard is on land formed of alluvial deposit resting upon a bed of gravel, and is, therefore, one of the best points in the United States for the building of dry docks, the primary expense of construction being less and the resultant effects greater than are possible at any other point.

INDUSTRIAL ADVANTAGES.

This yard is physicaly a part of Philadelphia, a city of 1,600,000 inhabitants, 300,000 skilled workmen, and 16,000 separate manufacturing plants working in 300 different lines of manufacture. It is in the very heart of a great producing section, excellently served by railroads, river, and canal, and with railroad connections extending directly into the yard. It is on the edge of the greatest coal and iron producing section of the United States and the most fertile and productive agriculture district.

The Philadelphia Navy Yard is a part of that city which leads the world in iron and steel working plants and in the manufacture of the highest type of machinery. At its very doors it has the means for supplying its every need, either in time of war or peace, and within a radius of 100 miles can draw supplies in men or materials from six States with a population of 22,000,000.

SKILLED LABOR.

The labor market is second only to tactical position in the important considerations that determine the fitness of a site for a Government naval base, and in this respect the Philadelphia Navy Yard is better equipped than any other. Recent necessity demanded the expansion of the working forces in some of the shops to two, three, and four times their previous force. No difficulty was experienced in getting men, many of whom were so well qualified that they were immediately made assistant foremen. The explanation lies in the fact that the many large and well-equipped shipbuilding plants on the Delaware River, in or near Philadelphia, provide an ever-ready army of skilled workmen in the shipbuilding trades. Comparison of labor costs in the shipyards with those near the navy yards at Boston and New York show a differential of 11 per cent in favor of the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

MATERIAL MARKET.

Philadelphia is in the very heart of the steel and fuel industries, and all materials are consequently cheaper in this, the home market. Steel castings and armament can be contracted for on running contract, and be obtained as quickly as though there were a steel foundry located in the yard.

PHILADELPHIA.

The Philadelphia Navy Yard is connected with Philadelphia proper by a city park, boulevard, and plaza 1½ miles long, on which the city has already expended $3,000,000 and contemplates the expenditure of almost as much more. Direct communication between the yard and the heart of Philadelphia is furnished by a trolley line, which is a part of a system 600 miles long, over which 2,000 cars are operated daily. It takes 20 minutes by trolley from the Philadelphia Navy Yard to Philadelphia's City Hall. In addition to its physical, industrial, and manufacturing advantages indispensable to an efficient navy yard, Philadelphia, with its 300,000 skilled workmen as part of the permanent population, is a navy-yard asset not to be had elsewhere. Officers and men have opportunities for every form of amusement. The city's 900 churches and 350 schools indicate its moral and educational influences. As the scene of the signing of the Declaration of Independence, as the birthplace of the Republic, and the promulgation of our Constitution, the force of its tradition is toward patriotism and loyalty to country, and as a consequence officers and men find in Philadelphia a public appreciation and heartfelt welcome unequaled in any other American city.

SUMMARY.

The Philadelphia Navy Yard has a greater area than the combined docks and yards of Great Britain.

Is 90 miles from the sea, and affords a fresh-water harbor where vessels can coal, repair, and load with provisions and men or remain indefinitely safe from attack by a foreign power.

Has a 30-foot channel and is soon to have a 35-foot channel to the sea.

Is nearer to better and cheaper labor and material markets than any other United States navy yard.

Is physically part of the greatest manufacturing and producing center in America.

Has at its very doors the largest and best-equipped shipbuilding plants in the country.

Has direct railroad connection with the interior, and is near enough to Washington to be under direct Federal control.

I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order and permit this item of $15,000 to remain in the bill in order that work can be started on this great dry dock, the construction of which is so strongly urged by the people of Philadelphia.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert the following letters and a statement from Capt. A. W. Grant, commandant of the Philadelphia Navy Yard:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 14, 1913.

Hon. THOMAS S. BUTLER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: In the preparation of the naval bill for the next fiscal year, by your subcommittee No. 1, of the Committee on Naval Affairs, can you not have placed in the bill an appropriation of $100,000 for the drawing of plans and necessary preliminary work for the 1,700-foot dry dock for the Philadelphia Navy Yard? It is not necessary for me to say that I am intensely interested in this proposed improvement to our great navy yard. I am daily in receipt of letters and resolutions by business exchanges of Philadelphia advocating the new dock, in fact the people of Philadelphia are practically unanimous in favor of the work being done.

Cordially, yours,

WILLIAM S. VARE.

FEBRUARY 4, 1913.

Hon. THOMAS S. BUTLER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: Referring to my letter of January 14, relative to proposed appropriation of $100,000 for the drawing of plans and preliminary work at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, I understand that the Navy Department has made an estimate of the drawing of plans, etc., at about $15,000, so that if we are unable to secure more than the $15,000 we will commit Congress to the selection of the Philadelphia Navy Yard as the place for the building of the dock which was recommended for the Atlantic coast. I am informed that this bill will probably be considered by your committee Wednesday or Thursday.

Sincerely, yours,

WM. S. VARE.

FEBRUARY 4, 1913.

Hon. ARTHUR L. BATES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: In the preparation of the naval bill for the next fiscal year by the Committee on Naval Affairs, can you not have placed in the bill an appropriation sufficient for the drawing of plans and necessary preliminary work for the 1,700-foot dry dock for the Philadelphia Navy Yard?

It is unnecessary for me to state that I am intensely interested in this proposed improvement to our great navy yard. I am in receipt of numerous letters and petitions from business firms and individuals of the city of Philadelphia advocating the new dock; in fact the people of Philadelphia are practically unanimous in favor of the project.

Sincerely, yours,

WM. S. VARE.

Similar letters also sent to the following: Hon. G. E. FOSS, E. W. ROBERTS, G. A. LOUD, A. W. KOPP, W. J. BROWNING.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1913.

Hon. WM. S. VARE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: Your favor at hand and it gives me pleasure to inform you that I voted for the 1,700-foot dry dock at Philadelphia in the committee to-day, and it was carried by a substantial majority and will appear in the naval appropriation bill.

With high regards, very truly, yours,

ARTHUR L. BATES.

Resolution requesting general cooperation in the effort to secure congressional sanction for the 1,700-foot dry dock at the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

Whereas the present Secretary of the Navy, George von L. Meyer, in his annual report to Congress in December, 1911, declared it was imperatively necessary that provision should be made for a 1,000-foot dry dock on the Atlantic coast; and the officials of the Philadelphia Navy Yard, familiar with all the facts, have reported that no better location could be found among the yards of the East than that at Philadelphia:

Resolved, That the South Philadelphia Business Men's Association supports the Representative in Congress from this, the first district, Hon. WILLIAM S. VARE, and the Philadelphia delegation, in urging anew upon Congress the claims and advantages of the Philadelphia Navy Yard for the location of a great modern dock; that we request our delegates to the united body to enlist that organization in the crusade, as well as the individual associations represented, and that the secretaries be instructed to communicate with and ask for the cooperation of all local trade, commercial, and other organizations, as well as firms and individuals, to the end that resolutions or letters indorsing the movement shall be forwarded at once to Hon. WILLIAM S. VARE, Washington, D. C., for presentation to the House of Representatives after Congress assembles.

In support of the argument that the Philadelphia Navy Yard is the most eligible site on the Atlantic coast for the location of the proposed modern dock the following facts are presented:

The Philadelphia Navy Yard is so situated as to be impossible of successful attack by a hostile fleet; on a river that has a rise and fall of tide of only 6.2 feet, with a 30-foot channel to the sea and Government provision for 35 feet; beyond the reach at all times of salt water, and yet so easy of approach that the challenge has been made by local navy-yard officials that a squadron of eight warships, in divisions of four, can be anchored at the yard in almost as few hours as days at other yards.

Its area of 923 acres, 476 of water and 447 of land, makes it the largest yard in the world and equal in size to the combined yards and docks of Great Britain; with a river front along which 7 vessels can be berthed and 12 can be anchored off the yard in midstream without interfering with commerce, while the entire battleship fleet of the Nation could be laid up in ordinary in the back channel.

This back channel or reserve basin is one of the principal assets of the yard, and because of its fresh water is peculiarly adapted for the storage of steel vessels temporarily out of commission, for the hulls are cleansed of the marine growths which attach themselves at sea, and the ships are safe from damage by passing craft or floating ice.

It is to add to the strategical value and utility of this basin that the local navy-yard officials have requested that the modern dry dock be built there. The only entrance to the channel is by way of the Schuylkill River, which, through accident or design in times of emergency, might be blocked.

It is to prevent this, as well as to add to the sanitation of the water in the channel that the Philadelphia Navy Yard officials have proposed that the basin be connected directly with the Delaware River by a 1,700-foot dry dock. Such a dock would be of sufficient capacity to receive two of the largest ships of the present day.

The Philadelphia Navy Yard is physically a part of Philadelphia, where live 300,000 skilled workmen, many of them mechanics whose services would be invaluable in case of stress. It has unexcelled railroad and water connection, the railroad communication extending directly into the yard. Within easy reach are the greatest coal and iron producing sections and the most fertile agricultural district.

The approach to the yard from the city is over a plaza, boulevard, and park nearly 2 miles long, on which Philadelphia is spending millions of dollars, and direct communication is furnished by trolley cars which give quick and rapid access to all parts of the city, 20 minutes being the time consumed in reaching the City Hall. In addition to its artesian supply, the yard has the advantage of the city's filtered water.

In short, officials and boards of experts almost without number have declared that the Philadelphia Navy Yard has advantages for a naval base possessed by no other yard in the world.

STATEMENT FROM CAPT. A. W. GRANT, COMMANDANT PHILADELPHIA NAVY YARD, FEBRUARY 20, 1913.

GRANT RESENTS BITTER ATTACK ON NAVY YARD—COMMANDANT REFUTES NORFOLK'S SLANDERS ON PHILADELPHIA'S HARBOR—WANTS BIG DRY DOCK.

The Philadelphia Navy Yard, the harbor of Philadelphia, and the resources of this city have been attacked in a formal communication to Congress by the Board of Trade and the Business Men's Association of Norfolk, Va., and by the Business Men's Association of Portsmouth, Va.

The location of the huge new dry dock planned by the Navy Department for the Atlantic seaboard in the Philadelphia Navy Yard is the object of the unprecedented and unsparing attack.

Fortunately for Philadelphia, immediate and effective reply to the slanderous statement is made through the columns of the Press by the man best qualified to speak, Capt. A. W. Grant, commandant of the Philadelphia Navy Yard. Equipped with absolute knowledge not only of conditions in this yard and this port, but also of the Norfolk yard and its approaches, he deals telling blows in defense of Philadelphia and sledge-hammer smashes at the pretensions and false claims of those who are desperately trying to get the big dock for the Norfolk yard.

A MASS OF MISSTATEMENTS.

Capt. Grant, informally discussing the Norfolk petition, declared it to be a mass of misstatements and to lack every element of fairness.

He called to the attention of Philadelphians the fact that united, determined action is necessary on the part of Pennsylvania's Representatives and Senators to keep in the naval appropriation bill the item inserted by Representative ROBERT E. LEE, authorizing the construction of a 1,700-foot dry dock in the Philadelphia yard.

His formal reply to the Norfolk petition, coming as it does upon the heels of that document, can not but have a profound effect upon the deliberations of Congress concerning this most important matter. He makes it clear that the issue is now between Philadelphia and Norfolk, and he shows why the local yard is immeasurably to be preferred to its rival.

POINTS IN NORFOLK'S ATTACK.

The portion of the Norfolk petition relating to the Philadelphia yard prefaces that document and, in its entirety, is as follows:

"To the Congress of the United States:

"A résumé of the comparative merits of the League Island and of the Norfolk Navy Yards may assist the congressional minds to act on Secretary Meyer's recommendation for an Atlantic coast dry dock of 1,000 feet dimensions, those two yards now being the rivals for its location.

"The League Island Navy Yard at Philadelphia is a fresh-water station suitable for reserve ships only, having a tortuous channel of 28 feet depth, 88 miles from the sea, subject to shifting bottoms and constant freezing up.

"As a repair and fitting-out base it is lacking in every essential feature, and its adoption as the site of the new dry dock would necessitate an immense appropriation to give that uncertain channel a uniform depth of 35 feet.

"For at least three months on an average every year climatic conditions are so severe as to impede and often to prevent outdoor work, thus increasing costs and entailing delays.

"The fortifications at the Delaware Breakwater can not be compared to Fortress Monroe, the second defense line of Hampton Roads.

"The rail transportation is not superior to that of Norfolk, while Philadelphia can not be compared with the steamship facilities of the Virginia ports.

"As a naval base in time of war it can not be considered at all, for reasons which are apparent to every naval expert of dispassionate judgment."

COMMANDANT GRANT'S ANSWER.

The commandant is of the opinion that the petition, while nominally from the business organization, is really the work of one man.

The formal statement of Commandant Grant upon this portion of the petition follows:

"There has recently been appropriated $570,000 for the enlargement of the dry dock at Norfolk. This yard has a dock capable of docking vessels larger than any that has yet been appropriated for, as has also the navy yard, New York.

"The necessity for another dock at the navy yard, Norfolk, is not apparent. The capacity of the Philadelphia Navy Yard for vessels of the war fleet exceeds that of all other yards. The back basin is capable of berthing 20 or 30 battleships, and the necessity of another opening or outlet to that basin—one of known width and depth—to eliminate the possibility of the vessels in reserve being bottled up by the sinking of a coal, mud, or laden or other vessel in the Schuylkill River is too apparent. It is a necessity in our national defense.

"The sinking of such a vessel to-day would bottle up for an indefinite period the battleships Maine, Kentucky, Iowa, Kearsarge, Wisconsin, Massachusetts, Alabama, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, and Mississippi, and the scout cruisers Chester and Birmingham, not to mention the Columbia and Minneapolis, Terror and Miantonomah in ordinary.

"Can the Nation stand for any such possibility?

CANAL AND DRY DOCK COMBINED.

"The recommendation made for a 1,700-foot dry dock contemplates the construction of a canal from the back basin to the Delaware River. Such a canal to be provided with caissons at both entrances and at a midway point that will permit of dry docking vessels at either end, or, in case of an unusually large vessel, the middle caisson could be left out and any vessel, no matter what its length up to 1,700 feet and of 110 feet beam with a 35-draft over the entrance sill, could be placed in dry dock.

"The construction of such a canal and dry dock combined will eliminate the danger from entrance via the Schuylkill River to the back basin.

"The cost of such construction is far lower than of any dock that has been or will be constructed elsewhere. It is only $3,000,000 for a 1,700-foot dock, of which only $15,000 is asked at this time."

CRITICISM ANSWERED.

The entire statement covering Philadelphia is subject to remarks, as follows:

"This yard (Philadelphia Navy Yard) is a fresh-water station, suitable for reserve ships only."

Answer. "Inasmuch as the Philadelphia Navy Yard has repaired for years all vessels of the Atlantic Fleet and has had in dry dock the latest battleships (Arkansas and Wyoming), the bare statement made in the pamphlet is not at all convincing."

"A tortuous channel."

"This is a plain misstatement of fact, due undoubtedly to the inborn ignorance of the author."

"Twenty-eight-foot depth."

"See report of Army engineer officer. We have 30 feet."

"Eighty-eight miles from sea."

"Another example of author's ignorance. We are only 83 miles from Overfalls lightship."

"Subject to shifting bottoms."

"Where does the author receive his information? Ask the Pilots' Association if there are any shifting bottoms in the river. I have never heard of any myself, and I am sure the words 'shifting bottoms' are used in a sense by the ignorant author indicating that the bottom of the river is not of uniform depth."

"Constant freezing up."

"This yard is subject to constant freezing up! The Press recalls well, as do many people, when the Elizabeth River, leading from Hampton Roads to the navy yard, 12 miles distant, was frozen over and traffic in the port of Norfolk was practically suspended."

"There has never been a season or winter when traffic was not open on the Delaware to an extent equal to the southern Chesapeake."

"As a repair and fitting-out base it is lacking in every essential feature."

"This statement is devoid of common sense. I would ask the author to make a specific statement, but we know 'twould be impossible."

"And its adoption, etc., to the end of the sentence, etc., of 35 feet."

"If anyone can make sense in this sentence, please translate it. It includes an absolutely false statement. The conditions in Philadelphia differ little, if at all, from Norfolk, Va."

AS TO RAIL TRANSPORTATION.

"'The fortifications at the Delaware Breakwater can not be compared to Fortress Monroe, the second defense line of Hampton Roads.'"

"The author shows his ignorance of conditions. The Delaware is not fortified at the breakwater."

"'The rail transportation is not superior to that of Norfolk, while Philadelphia can not be compared with the steamship facilities of the Virginia ports.'"

"This is absurd and untrue."

"'As a naval base in time of war it can not be considered at all, for reasons which are apparent to every naval expert of dispassionate judgment.'"

"The statement by the author of this article, like previous ones, is made without knowledge of the subject under discussion. There is no navy yard on the Atlantic coast comparable with the Philadelphia Navy Yard for the repair of vessels of all descriptions in time of war. The inference drawn from the statement might lead a layman to believe that the Norfolk Navy Yard would be used as a base.

"Is the author not cognizant of the fact that the Norfolk Navy Yard is but a repair station, and that the use of the lower end of Chesapeake Bay for an anchorage ground has no connection whatsoever with the yard? An anchorage in Hampton Roads, 12 miles from the navy yard, or in Lynn Haven Bay, inside of Cape Henry, 25 miles from the navy yard at Norfolk, would under certain conditions be used as a base of operations for a defending fleet."

ARGUMENTS FOR NORFOLK YARD.

The commandant then proceeds to dissect Norfolk's claims as set forth in the petition. Excerpts from the petition are in double quotation marks.

"'With a climate ever free from ice and disturbing storms, channel 35 feet deep to the ocean, 27 miles distant, soon to be made 1,000 feet wide, 14 miles from the rendezvous grounds in Hampton Roads, and 55 miles from the southern naval drill grounds, when estimated in connection with the following facts, it is the only logical location for the largest dry dock in America, eventually to become the leading naval station of the Nation.'"

"(a) There is scarcely a winter that the Elizabeth River, on which the Norfolk Navy Yard is situated, is not frozen over or filled with floating ice to an extent equal to the harbor of Philadelphia.

"(b) Norfolk has no such channel. On June 30, 1912, a channel of the depth from Hampton Roads to the navy yard, Norfolk, only a distance of 11 miles, with width of 400 feet only, was but 59 per cent completed, estimated cost being $800,000. On June 30, 1912, Thimble Shoal, which is to be dredged to a depth of 33 feet and of a width of 500 feet for a distance of 5 miles, was 83 per cent completed, estimated cost being $660,000.

"(c) Norfolk Navy Yard is 27 miles distant from Cape Henry Lighthouse, 32 miles to the lighted buoy, which compares with Over Falls Lightship when reckoning distance from the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

"(d) Why claim a channel 1,000 feet wide when such width is in contemplation only?

"(e) What bearing has the distance of the southern naval drill grounds to do with the Norfolk Navy Yard as a repair station?"

ESSENTIALS FOR A NAVAL BASE.

"'Every essential for a complete naval base centered here—accessibility, defensibility, depth of water, protection from storms, food supply, labor markets, material markets, and rail connection and climatic conditions.'

"Each one of the eight essentials for a complete naval base claimed for the Norfolk Navy Yard may be equally claimed for the Philadelphia Navy Yard, but with greater emphasis. The Elizabeth River, opposite the navy yard, is so narrow that it is scarcely possible to turn or wind a vessel of 500 feet length in the river. At Philadelphia positions have been determined for locating moorings for anchoring 12 battleships 500 feet in length opposite the navy yard.

"The average length of pier from the navy yard, extending into the Delaware River at Philadelphia, is over 600 feet, and we have nearly a half mile of water over 30 feet deep beyond that for the handling or maneuvering of vessels. The labor and material market as well as rail connection at the navy yard, Philadelphia, exceeds that of any other navy yard in the United States.

"'It may be taken as a maxim that the Government interest in the development of a port is in direct ratio to its use of that port.'

"We agree with this statement; but what has it all to do with comparing the navy yard at Norfolk with the navy yard at Philadelphia?

ASSEMBLING OF FLEETS.

"'Mobilizing fleets assemble at Hampton Roads, where all its units fit out with coal from local piers—victual from America's great truck field around Norfolk—fill up with stores of every kind at a minimum cost.'

"Here the author introduces Hampton Roads, claiming the anchorage ground, 12 miles from the navy yard, as a part of said yard. There is not a unit of the battleship fleet that takes on coal from local piers. They either coal from barges or from colliers alongside, which receive their coal from coal piers as they do in Philadelphia.

"The statemeut concerning the victualing of the fleet from the truck field around Norfolk is absurd. The naval ration consists largely of meats carried in cold storage, and, so far as vegetables are concerned, more than 50 per cent are potatoes. All provisions are supplied by quarterly or annual contracts, and it makes no difference whether the ship is in Norfolk, Boston, or New Orleans as regards the food supplied.

AS TO RAILROAD CONNECTIONS.

"'Instead of expensive distribution to New York, Boston, and Philadelphia—the home stations—all Federal ships could receive immediate repair at the Norfolk Navy Yard, if the same secured desired appropriation.'

"By home stations the author refers to home yards for repairs of vessels of the active fleet. Money makes the mare go, the world over. If Congress will appropriate sufficient funds the fleet could be repaired in Hudson Bay, if desired.

"'Rail systems having 42,000 miles of trackage, giving the most favorable of terminal rates of freight, connect Norfolk with all the natural supply depots; even concrete work is not interfered with in winter; labor has always been equal to the demands in this growing focus of railroad concentration, and hence all construction is cheaper than at any other yard.'

"How absurd is this argument! Philadelphia may with equal propriety claim the trackage of the vast Pennsylvania Railroad system and of the Reading, Lehigh Valley, and Central Railroad of New Jersey.

"'In time of war Hampton Roads would be the inevitable rendezvous of all the fleet on the Atlantic coast, and yet the Norfolk Navy Yard, failing in appropriations to develop the 272 acres with ample water front, could only take care of six ships at one time, the balance awaiting their turn while riding at anchor.'

"The author shows the Norfolk Navy Yard to be a small affair to be able to take care of six ships only at one time. At Philadelphia this fall, previous to the naval review in New York, 22 ships in commission were berthed at the yard and left here for the rendezvous. More than one-third of the tonnage of all ships at that rendezvous had been safely berthed at the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

POSSIBILITIES OF DEVELOPMENT.

"The possibilities, at small cost, of adapting that area, acquired in 1904, to present the future needs are: A double end, 1,000-foot modern dry dock, with intermediate gate; a caisson to permit of its use as two small dry docks when the larger dock is not desired; a coaling station for reserve supply of 200,000 tons to provide against strikes and other disturbing events, capable of loading at one time 4 colliers with 1,200 tons per hour; sea water and piers for 28 modern dreadnoughts berthing at once, besides many other essentials.

"The possibilities referred to above apply equally well to the navy yard at Philadelphia, with this difference: That the accomplishment of a 1,700-foot dry dock at Philadelphia, forming a channel of known width and depth from the back basin to the Delaware River, can be constructed for less money than a 1,000-foot dry dock at the navy yard, Norfolk.

"With a dry dock of the largest dimensions, capable of docking any vessels of the United States fleet to-day, at Norfolk, why the necessity of a second dock? The largest dry dock at the navy yard at Philadelphia can not dock a vessel larger than the Utah class, and it is an imperative necessity that there should be a new dock provided immediately for the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

NORFOLK LOOKS TO THE FUTURE.

"With the future great inland waterway from Florida to Boston passing immediately by this yard, with all its contingent benefits in war time, and the perfecting of the above improvements, jointly considered in connection with the weight of other features cited, could there be any doubt of its choice if fitness alone influence the decision? The vital interests of the Government, of the naval establishment, are involved, without taking into consideration the effect upon the trade relations of the Nation's greatest indentation—Chesapeake Bay.

"The inland waterway from Florida to Boston, which the author mentions as passing along the navy yard at Norfolk, also passes the navy yard at Philadelphia, and until such waterway is of dimensions large enough to take battleships of the first class, it can have no bearing or influence upon the subject of the construction of a dry dock of maximum dimensions.

"'This statement of facts is issued under the authority of the board of trade and business men's association.'

"This misstatement of fact should have been really written by the board of trade. The whole document disproves itself."

Senator H. D. Money Laid to Rest Amid Friends.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. THOMAS U. SISSON,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 26, 1913.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper article:

SENATOR H. D. MONEY LAID TO REST AMID FRIENDS.

The special train which brought the remains of former Senator Hernando De Soto Money and the funeral party from Gulfport arrived here at 6.43 a. m., and was met by a large party of citizens, headed by the P. F. Liddell Camp, United Confederate Veterans, on last Friday morning, September 20.

The remains were borne to the Baptist Church and there lay in state till 10.30 a. m., the hour fixed for the obsequies.

Many gray-haired men, who knew the former Senator from his boyhood and always called him Hernando, with tear-dimmed eyes viewed the face of their lost friend. The Baptist Church, the largest auditorium in town, was too small to hold the great throng of people, who loved him in life and now revere his memory. The ceremony was conducted by the Rev. William Hayne Leavell, D. D., LL. D., assisted by Rev. S. M. Thames. The hymns sung were, "Lead, Kindly Light," "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," and "Nearer, My God, to Thee."

SPLENDID TRIBUTE PAID.

Distinguished men, who for 10 years have heard the greatest men in Congress and in the Senate and the great preachers of the country, pronounced Dr. Leavell's oration a masterpiece of thought and eloquence.

The basis of the preacher's remarks was the words of Paul: "I have fought a good fight, I have kept the faith." He spoke with deep insight and keen analysis of Senator Money's character and close relations to Senator George. They were as father and son.

Following is a synopsis of Dr. Leavell's tribute:

2 Timothy iv: 7-8: I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course. I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day.

These words of an old man are great words. In them is the scent of war, the line of battle, the deployed forces, the given order, the advance, the tumult of strife, the rout of opposing hosts, the triumphant shout of victory—all these are found in the exultant exclamation of Paul, the apostle of Jesus Christ. This exultation in its triumphant tones is second only to that final victorious burst of our Lord, "It is finished."

There is nothing to approximate it in profane history. The announcement of Caesar after he had subdued the West, "I came, I saw, I conquered," has a note of bravado, and is not to be compared with the fine and modest announcement of Paul. Nothing less would have adequately conveyed his confidence. He was a prisoner for the truth's sake; the heavy shadow of the block lay across his path. Yet in these discouraging circumstances his soul, sustained by faith in the future and confidence of the past, with intrepid calm rang out the noble words, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith."

Paul uttered these words for himself and for all men who can appropriate them.

Life is a battle—continued, laborious, dangerous, shifting. It is only by the exercise of a strong, moral muscle that one can win his fight and secure the approval of Heaven. To maintain a character for Christian morality requires energy of action, scrupulous self-examination, and single, unwavering trust, for it is a hard and sometimes a bitter thing to be always upright and honorable in this strange world of ours.

It is appropriate that every man should strive for the coveted honors and prizes of life, and the laurels which crown his head are those won by his hand.

In fighting for the honor of one's country, for the "ashes of his fathers and the temples of his gods," it is something to stand undaunted at Thermopylae, to confront the sweeping scythe of death at Balaklava, but this is nothing to the courage required for the steady maintenance of honest character amid the temptations and evils of this world. In this fight you are often misunderstood, not infrequently condemned, scarcely ever inspired and sustained by the hearty cheers of the admiring multitude and the loud huzzas of the public onset.

To Paul there were two analogies of life often in his mind. One was a battle everybody must fight, the other a race everybody must run. His course was marked out for him, all his "steps were ordered of the Lord." Converted from a narrow-minded Pharisee he was at once ordered to sweep inside the cobwebs of prejudice which had grown with his years, strengthened with his strength, and spun themselves into the very fiber of his soul; he must sweep these aside and enlarge the boundaries of human faith, preach a gospel whose breadth of privilege not merely excited the wrath of his opponents, but amazed and frightened his associates and friends. He was to cry aloud and spare not.

I make no doubt that the sense of his lonely advocacy, the sad and unmanly desertion by his friends and fellow laborers, as well as the marvelous achievements he was ordained to win by his ministry, all tended to burden him with a load almost too great to bear. But he held on his way through every discouragement, under every cloud, permitted neither embarrassment nor perplexity to stop his advance or turn him aside, and at last finished his course to the honor of God and the lasting benefit of mankind. With patient perseverance he persisted to the end.

He finished his course, reached the end of it. Seventy years is the divine allotment of man's days, and it is a great period. Some fall short, and some by reason of strength go four score years; but three score years and ten is a long stretch of the brittle tether of human life.

During the days of the seventy and odd years of this man's life he saw some of the noblest triumphs of war and the yet nobler triumphs of peace. The greatest achievements of mind over matter by which the world's civilization is advanced were won during this long period.

While others were demolishing nations one day and reconstructing civilizations the next; while others were endowing the facilities of travel with greater speed, even conquering the air and competing with the eagle in his flight; while others still were inventing telegraphs, laying cables, establishing communication between distant points by means of the human voice and the waves of the air, this man was serving his day and generation in other walks, pursuing the even tenor of his way, winning the confidence of his associates, holding the affection of his friends, and doing his mightiest to serve to the limit of his power so as to finish his course before he reached his end, to complete it before being forced to stop. And speaking with the reservation becoming to humanity one may say he could claim to have worthily rounded out his life before he was gathered to his fathers.

I believe it can be said that he left few moral obligations outstanding. In simplicity of heart he fulfilled the requirements of a keen sense of honor and a high sense of right.

Paul had a faith which he kept to the end of his course. No trial or danger or anguish, neither principalities nor powers nor life nor death could separate him from it as it was delivered into his hands. He would neither sacrifice, compromise, nor suppress the truth as he saw it. He was, however, as wide as the poles apart from the assumption of some modern defenders of the faith who would press within narrower bounds the wide limits which Jesus Christ set to His gospel. In every sense, both as a divine theory and a human practice, Paul would keep his faith until he had finished his course and was gathered to his fathers. So he lived and so he died.

How much of all this H. D. Money for himself, or his friends for him, could properly appropriate, you know as well as I; some of you even better than I. While no praise of him I may sing will make music in his soul nor change in any way your estimate of his life and character, I am to speak of him as I knew him.

My friendship for Mr. Money was in reality a bequest. It came to me by reason of my association with the family of a man to whom he was always devotedly attached. He merely lengthened the line so as to include me, and I soon came to appreciate and admire him in many ways.

Here in Carrollton, where he grew to manhood and where he lived for many years at different periods of his life, it is fitting that he be laid to rest among his kinsmen and neighbors. And here again that friendship with Senator George, which was never interrupted until 15 years ago, when the death of the elder man removed him from the reach of the younger man's active friendship. That friendship, however, was continued to the children and to children's children. It was and it is an inherited friendship, running with the generations.

There have been famous friendships, whose memory is perpetuated in immortal literature. While the friendship of these two men may not be so famous, it was as deep, sincere, loving, and mutually dependent as any friendship ever sung by poet. I know that the older man regarded the younger as the most useful friend he ever had, one who was always ready to help him in the ways he needed help, and because of his peculiar talents he was able to help in many ways.

When Senator George announced his purpose not to stand for reelection to the Senate, Mr. Money, with some half dozen others, became a candidate for the succession. Several of these gentlemen had been very serviceable to the old Senator, and because of that it was his purpose to take no part in the selection of his successor. But circumstances arose which drew a letter from him, and in this very letter, in which this intention was announced, he did the thing in perfect innocency and simplicity which he meant not to do. By a providential slip of the pen he declared that while Hernando D. Money was his friend, and while he looked upon him as the "best equipped man in the State" for the office to which he aspired, he would take no part in his selection. Those of you who remember the influence of Senator George in the State of Mississippi can easily determine how far the expression of such a judgment went to secure the succession to his friend. Each looked upon the other as his best and most serviceable friend until they were parted at the grave.

Mr. Money's personal qualities, which went to make up his character, were of a type so well defined and distinct as to illustrate and explain the man he was and the admiration he won. I have not time to analyze, but I do want to mention one thing which marked his character that is not always found in even strong men. Mr. Money possessed that rare quality which combines in one both physical and moral courage. His was a double courage. He never feared the face of man, and he never hesitated to espouse a conviction or denounce a fraud, whatever the danger to either his person or his fortunes. And he is a brave man, indeed, who fears neither his foes nor himself; who has the courage of his convictions and hurls his lance wherever the fight is thickest.

Mr. Money's capabilities were high and many, and they, taken together with his fine opportunities, made him an eminently useful public servant. His information was both wide and varied, and all his knowledge seemed always ready for use. This served to make him one of the most captivating and instructive conversationalists I have ever known, as well as one of the best and most effective public speakers.

His memory seemed peculiar in one very valuable respect. It was not a memory in which everything stuck that entered, so as to make his knowledge an undigested mass of information of every sort. On the contrary, while his memory was remarkably tenacious it was also singularly discriminating. It seemed always able without effort to discriminate between what was valuable and what was not valuable, and hold the one and reject or forget the other. His very extensive learning was therefore not overburdened with irrelevant matter, and was able to supply just that which was most needed for the occasion whenever it arose.

His diligent pursuit of knowledge on all subjects that interested him and that lay along the lines of his service was a thing that made me often wonder whenever I thought of his very defective sight and the very great difficulty that must put in his way. But his industry not only never flagged—it seemed always to conquer—was conspicuously victorious where most of us would have discharged ourselves from the obligation of diligence. He did the State great service.

Of his domestic life and character it is enough to say that he was a devoted husband and an indulgent father. His whole married life was a romance. When we laid his wife away just a few years ago I was with him. Under the weight of that sorrow he stood unbent, upright as a man should who was conscious of having fulfilled all his obligations to the dear wife who had gone with him all the way of his mature years. In the atmosphere created by the beautiful years in which they walked together, seeing eye to eye, he was able to live his life and go his way when only the memory of that blessed companionship remained. And no father ever more wholly and unselfishly surrendered himself to the affectionate requirements of those for whom he felt himself responsible. He cared for his own.

He was a faithful friend, a learned counselor, an eminent citizen. His character was singularly clean amid many temptations; his life was wonderfully full of service; and he comes to the "grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in in its season."

Here amid familiar scenes he is laid away, being borne to his final rest by some still remaining few of those who first went out with him to fight the battles of his country. His cause was both won and lost. In both victory and defeat he was a patriot. For after all is said, a patriot is but a successful rebel, and a rebel is only a defeated patriot.

We lay him away in the hope of a blessed resurrection.

The order of march from church to cemetery was as follows: The minister, the pallbearers, the bier, members of Senator Money's family, relatives, visiting statesmen, State officials, H. D. Money Chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy; P. F. Liddel Camp, United Confederate Veterans; other veterans, and citizens.

Among the distinguished visitors were Chancellor J. F. McCool, Hon. W. W. Stone, Hon. E. J. Bowers, Congressmen T. U. SISSON and B. P. HARRISON, Attorney Hernando Money Adams, Senator Elect VARDAMAN, and many others.

The Late Senator Taylor, of Tennessee.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. C. BASCOM SLEMP,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 23, 1913,

On House resolution 864, paying tribute to the memory of Hon. ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR, late a Senator from the State of Tennessee.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR was an example of how a mortal man could pass through things temporal without losing the things eternal. To him heaven began here on earth. He did not have to die to gain eternal life. He made his own heaven right here 'midst the changes and chances of mortal life.

He was prepared as are few men to enter into the wider sphere which is the natural domain of the soul, not an unfamiliar country to one whose earthly atmosphere was akin to the realms in which abides the peace that the world can not give.

BOB TAYLOR won many a victory on the battle field of politics, but these, compared to his conquests of love, were nothing worth. He held dominion over the hearts of men, women, and children. Love begets love. BOB TAYLOR loved his fellow creatures. His whole life was an outpouring of love. His acts, his motives, his words, were prompted by compassionate love. And in return all who knew him or only knew of him loved him.

The honors that came to him were but incidents in his unselfish life, and in and of themselves were to him but as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals if he could not, as he did, make them instruments for good for his fellow men.

People respected Senator TAYLOR, or Gov. TAYLOR, or Congressman TAYLOR as executive and lawmaker, but they loved BOB TAYLOR, the man. And as the period which knew him in the flesh recedes into the past he will be remembered for his deeds and words of love when his official acts shall have been forgotten.

It is a remarkable fact that men who have paid tribute to Senator TAYLOR in unison accent and emphasize the prime characteristic of his nature—that he loved his brethren with a love that was manifested in many and tender ways.

How rare and beautiful a possession is the heart of a brainy, busy man that has room in it for love, the very bond of peace and of all virtues, upon which the Great Apostle places a higher valuation than either faith or hope—"these three, faith, hope, and love, but the greatest of these is love."

Love is kind and suffers long,
Love is meek and thinks no wrong,
Love, than death itself, more strong.

BOB TAYLOR had gifts; he also had graces. Gifts pass, graces remain. Of graces there are three—one for each relation of life. Toward God there is faith; toward self, hope; toward others, love. Of these graces, love is greatest; for while faith and hope appropriate, love diffuses; and the grace which gives is more blessed than those which receive.

Faith will vanish into sight,
Hope be emptied in delight,
Love in Heaven will shine more bright.

Faith and hope and love we see;
Joining hand in hand agree,
But the greatest of the three,
And the best, is love.

BOB TAYLOR, while loving and beloved, was especially devoted to and loved by little children. He understood child life and entered into its little joys and sorrows. He was as a child—never too old to be unsympathetic, never too busy to catch the child spirit, and never too big to pass children by.

If the children of Tennessee alone could voice adequately what their hearts feel about their friend BOB TAYLOR, there would rise up pæans of praise that would echo through heaven's arches. BOB TAYLOR had the heart of a child, innocent, pure, trustful, hopeful, happy. Thrice blessed is he who is thus certified at the bar of heaven. For except ye become as a little child ye shall not enter there, "For of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

Of what worth are the material certificates that entered BOB TAYLOR'S name high on the honor roll of statecraft in the great offices of governor, Representative, and Senator, compared to the certificate that has entered his name upon the Book of Remembrance in the eternal and everlasting realms of love?

On a moss-covered tombstone in an old English churchyard is this simple epitaph:

He loved little children.

Truly might these words also be carved upon the stone that marks the bodily resting place of the late Senator from Tennessee in the happy valley where he was born, and nothing additional would be necessary to identify its occupant as BOB TAYLOR whose beautiful life of love, begun and lived here, is having and will have throughout eternity its glorious fruition in God's happy valley where all is love.

Panama Canal.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. McCALL,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Wednesday, February 26, 1913.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following from the Boston Evening Transcript of Saturday, February 8, 1913:

PROF. EUGENE WAMBAUGH, OF THE LAW SCHOOL OF HARVARD UNIVERSITY, ON WHY WE MUST LOSE THE CANAL CASE ON GROUNDS OF ORDINARY LAW.

THE QUESTION.

A "Trust for mankind" is what President Cleveland in a message termed such an enterprise as the Panama Canal. The question just now is whether such a trust is administered properly by giving to vessels engaged in the coasting trade of the United States a total exemption from tolls. It should be noticed that the question is not whether the tolls of such vessels may properly be paid out of the National Treasury—in which case the burden would be borne by all residents of the United States through the internal revenue, the tariff, and other taxes, and the benefit would be enjoyed initially by the treasury of the Panama Canal and eventually by all persons whom the canal may serve. No, the question is whether, in the words of the Panama Canal act of 1912, "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States."

This question is to some extent dependent upon treaty; but as a basis for understanding the whole matter it is essential to remember that a treaty is made in the light of existent national and international law, practice, and discussion. Hence the treaty itself may well be laid aside until after the presentation of other matters.

THE LAW OF ENGLAND AND AMERICA AS TO PUBLIC CALLINGS.

Let us begin at the beginning.

When a person builds a private railway on his own land he has a right to exclude all persons from using it and to exact any compensation he may see fit from any person to whom he may from time to time grant the occasional use of this private railway. Yet as soon as he holds out his railway as ready to serve the public he finds that the law now places upon him a new series of duties. This may be a surprise to the owner, for, naturally enough, he thinks that as long as he does not so use his property as to injure other persons he may use it as he pleases, continuing to exclude some persons from the advantages of the property and granting to other persons those advantages on any terms he may choose, whether those terms are identical or are discriminatory and whether they give him an enormous compensation or not. His natural belief as to this matter is wholly in conflict with American and English law. From the time when he holds out his railway as a means of serving the public he is held by the courts to have entered upon a public calling, and he is thereafter compelled by the courts to perform some peculiar duties, of which it is enough for the present purpose to specify three—the duty of serving all comers, the duty of serving all comers on the same terms, and the duty of charging only a reasonable rate.

It is not necessary to give in full the reasons upon which these rules of law are founded; but those to whom these rules come as a surprise may wish to know some of the reasons. Briefly, then, one of the reasons is found in the importance to the public of such service as this, and another is found in that discouragement of building other railways which arises from the building of this one. In other words, the public needs the service of a railway, and danger of competition from this one tends to prevent the building of another; and hence, unless this one can be compelled to give its chosen service fairly, the public will really suffer an injury.

The burdens, it should be repeated, are not cast upon this owner without his consent. If he had chosen, he might have carried on his railway wholly for himself, unless and until it should be taken from him by right of eminent domain; but by announcing his railway as open for the public he has assumed a new and peculiar position to which the law attaches special duties, and among others those enumerated duties of serving all, of serving without discrimination, and of serving at reasonable rates.

AN IMPORTANT DOCTRINE.

This is the important doctrine upon which rests a great part of the power of the State and Nation commissions which deal with railways and other public callings. It is indeed one of the most important of the doctrines by which public welfare is secured without departure into socialism.

The peculiar duties attaching to those entering upon a public calling belong not only to individuals but also to incorporated companies—and to incorporated companies more clearly than to individuals, because the incorporated company owes its very existence to that public which incorporated it. Besides, the incorporated company engaged in a public calling sometimes receives and uses that right of taking private property which is termed eminent domain, and as the right of eminent domain can not be exercised save by a government or under a grant given by a government, and whenever exercised must be used for public purposes, the mere exercise of the power of eminent domain carries with it the assumption of the duties of public service as to the property thus acquired.

Again, a municipal corporation which builds a railway for public use incurs the same duties, and still more clearly, for the municipal corporation is created by the State as an instrumentality for nothing but the public service.

Further, as a State is created by the people for public service exclusively, a State's railway, unless used exclusively by the State government itself, or by county or municipal governments, must be subject, as a matter of principle, to precisely similar duties. It is true that a State government, as distinguished from its officers, can not be sued without the State's consent, and that hence a State may enjoy practical immunity from suit; but the absence of a remedy can not blind anyone to the fact that a State owes duties; and the duties which the State imposes in behalf of the public against individuals and incorporated companies and municipalities can not honorably be said by a State to be nonexistent as duties of the State simply because the State may have supplied no machinery whereby the State itself can be subjected to compulsion.

THE GOLDEN RULE OF GOVERNMENT.

Finally, in case the United States should build a railway other than for the use of troops or for some similar end, resembling that to which a private individual for his own private purposes might devote a railway of his own, the United States, as a matter of principle, must come under the same duties attaching to a public calling—the duty of serving all, of serving equally, and of serving on reasonable terms. It is true that the United States can not without consent be sued in any court, whether the court be State, national, or international, and that hence there is no means known to ordinary law of enforcing such an obligation as this, and that thus in a sense the duty is merely moral; but some merely moral duties are perceptible by the law, and surely a duty precisely like one which the National Government enforces in its own courts against others can not, in case it rests upon the National Government itself, be termed in any abusive or disrespectful or minimizing sense a merely moral duty. Perhaps analytical jurists may say properly enough that there is no duty unless there is a whip behind it; but a nation can not say this with self-respect.

It follows, then, that if the United States enters upon any business belonging to the class called public callings there rest upon the United States, as matter of principle, the same duties which belong to others who enter upon such callings—the duties of serving all, of discriminating against none, and of serving at a reasonable rate. It should be understood that such duties derogate in no way from the full powers of government. No; as to the places where the United States may carry on these undertakings the United States must continue to have full power of keeping the peace and all the other powers for which governments are organized; but by entering upon a career essentially nongovernmental it would have assumed as to nongovernmental matters—in this instance as to some sort of business belonging to the class of public callings—the duties belonging to all other conductors of such callings.

THE CANAL AS A "PUBLIC CALLING."

And what are public callings? That is a difficult question to answer; but it is enough for the present purpose to point out that by both reason and authority the character of a public calling attaches to a canal. Indeed, a canal is a somewhat clearer instance than a railway; for canals, having preceded railways, were earlier examples of public calling; and, besides, a canal, more obviously than a railway, renders unlikely the building of a competitor in the same neighborhood and for the purpose of meeting the same need.

Thus, independently of any treaty, one reaches the conclusion that by the rules of law observed in the United States and England the United States, whenever owning a public canal, is, as matter of principle, under the duty of permitting the canal to be used by all comers, and at rates which do not discriminate, and at rates which are reasonable.

And what are reasonable rates? On the one side it is clear that the total amount of income is not unreasonable if it simply pays cost of operation and of depreciation, a fair interest on the investment, and a sum equivalent to insurance against disaster. On the other side, it is clear that a total income greatly in excess of this would be unreasonable. What is more difficult is to determine the reasonableness not of the total income, but of specific rates. On this last point it is, however, easy to see that any rate which causes the person paying it to bear more than his fair share is unreasonable. This is in fact another mode of reaching the undoubted result that rates must not be discriminatory, for, at least in cases where an enterprise is dependent wholly upon receipts, the exempting of some users carries with it the burdening of others. Yet it is unnecessary to go through this mode of reaching the result; for the duty of any pursuer of a public calling to abstain from discrimination is a duty which rests firmly enough on its own separate foundation of justice.

THE PROFESSION IN THE TREATY.

Thus far there has been no mention of the question whether the United States can be said to have made as to the Panama Canal an announcement of public service. Everyone knows that there is such a profession in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901. The words of the treaty will be given hereafter; but thus far it has seemed enough to show without reference to international treaties, presidential messages, and the like that if the United States, as owner of the Panama Canal, does make an announcement of public service there rests upon the United States, as a matter of principle, an obligation, as close to a legal obligation as can rest upon a government, to serve all comers, to serve them alike, and to serve them fairly.

Independently of treaty, it must be recognized as a sound general principle that when a nation enters upon a business which is nongovernmental it assumes toward its own citizens and toward the citizens of other nations duties similar to those owed by private individuals engaged in similar business, and more specifically that this is true as to those businesses which are demed public callings. It is not, however, in the present instance necessary to insist that such duties bind a nation in the absence of a treaty. It is enough to point out that certain peculiar duties attach to individuals engaged in certain occupations and then to insist that both the declarations of public officials and the words of treaties must be read in the light of the peculiar duties recognized and enforced against individuals by the ordinary law of the countries in interest.

THE DOCUMENTS PRECEDING THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

It is now time to turn to the documents which led up to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901. Do those documents show that the United States deemed it inappropriate for an interoceanic canal to be subject to the ordinary rules applicable to public callings? The very words of the essential documents must be quoted; and this will now be done.

In 1826, Henry Clay, Secretary of State, instructed the delegates to the Panama Congress that if a canal should ever be constructed through the Isthmus "the benefits of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls."

Again in 1835 there was a resolution passed by the Senate "that the President of the United States be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of other nations * * * for the purpose of * * * securing forever * * * the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking and complete the work."

In 1839 the House of Representatives adopted a similar resolution, requesting the President "to consider the expediency of opening or continuing negotiations * * * for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of effecting a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus, and of securing forever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations."

In the treaty of 1846, ratified in 1848, New Granada, now Colombia, "guarantees to the Government of the United States * * * that no other tolls or charges shall be levied or collected upon citizens of the United States * * * over any road or canal that may be made by the Government of New Granada, or by the authority of the same, than is, under like circumstances, levied upon and collected from the Granadian citizens"; and the purpose of this treaty is explained in President Polk's message to the Senate in 1847, thus: "Neither the Government of Granada nor that of the United States has any narrow or exclusive views. The ultimate object * * * is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus."

THE "EQUAL-TERMS" STIPULATION.

In 1850 the Clayton-Bulwer treaty between Great Britain and the United States, having in mind chiefly a canal through Nicaragua, agreed that neither of the two countries will hold, "directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other," and that each of them "shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans, for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all," and that the treaty shall extend in principle to any canal or railway across the Isthmus, and that it is understood "that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford."

In 1858 Lewis Cass, Secretary of State, in writing to the United States minister to Central America, said: "The progress of events has rendered the interoceanic routes across the narrow portions of Central America vastly important to the commercial world. * * * While the just rights of sovereignty of the States occupying this region should always be respected, we shall expect that these rights will be exercised in a spirit befitting the occasion and the wants and circumstances which have arisen. Sovereignty has its duties as well as its rights, and none of these local Governments * * * would be permitted, in a spirit of eastern isolation, to close these gates of intercourse on the great highways of the world, and justify the act by the pretension that these avenues of trade and travel belong to them, and that they choose to shut them, or, what is almost equivalent, to encumber them with such unjust regulations as would prevent their general use."

In the same year Mr. Cass, writing to the British minister to the United States, said as to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty: "The principle was that the interoceanic routes should * * * be neutral and free to all nations alike."

BLAINE'S STAND.

In 1881 James G. Blaine, Secretary of State, wrote to the United States minister to Great Britain that, while certain modifications were desired in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the United States "frankly agrees and will by public proclamation declare at the proper time, in conjunction with the republic on whose soil the canal may be located, that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations for the use of the canal, shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation."

Thus far the documents unanimously indicate recognition of those duties which pertain to all public callings. Only one document of a contrary tenor has been discovered. That is the projected convention of 1884 between Nicaragua and the United States. That convention provided for equal tolls for all nations, excepting coastwise vessels of the two parties to the convention. Yet this convention was withdrawn by President Cleveland from consideration by the Senate, and thus the record remains unbroken down to the Hay-Pauncefote treaties.

Finally, the Suez Canal convention of 1888, to which the United States was not a party, provided that "the Suez Maritime Canal shall always be free and open * * * to every vessel * * * without distinction of flag," and that "the high contracting parties, by application of the principle of equality as regards the free use of the canal, a principle which forms the basis of the present treaty, agree that none of them shall endeavor to obtain with respect to the canal territorial or commercial advantages or privileges in any international arrangements which may be concluded."

The Suez Canal convention may well serve as an introduction to the Hay-Pauncefote treaties; but it is hardly necessary for that purpose, for the American and English law as to public callings and the documents of the United States prior to the Hay-Pauncefote treaties, as has been shown, throw adequate and harmonious light upon the probable intent underlying those treaties. It now remains to inquire whether the treaties use language which overthrows the doctrines of public calling which anyone acquainted with law and with diplomatic history would expect to find recognized in them.

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY OF 1901.

So much for English and American law and the chain of documents prior to the Hay Pauncefote treaties, to which treaties discussion frequently is restricted.

The terms of the unratified Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1900 and of the ratified Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, now in force, are practically identical in all passages even remotely pertinent to the question of tolls.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 expressly superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and said:

"The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say: (1) The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable. * * * No change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

In the light of English and American law as to public callings, the words of this Hay-Pauncefote treaty, "open to vessels of all nations," "on terms of entire equality," "no discrimination," "charges just and equitable," sound not unfamiliar. In truth, those passages of the treaty are much like extracts from the opinions of English and American courts.

As has been pointed out, the United States, when it enters upon a world-wide public calling, such as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty describes, might well be held, even without treaty stipulations, to have assumed the duties which are created by the law prevalent in the United States as to such a calling. As government has established for private individuals engaged in a public calling the rule of equality and justice, a government—even though it be not under the duty of being more just than the private individual—will have to give reasons of extraordinary strength for holding that when it itself conducts a public calling the rule may be inequality and injustice.

Again, whatever might be the duties of the United States in the absence of a treaty, the system of law used by both England and the United States furnishes the natural and necessary introduction and commentary for any treaty between these countries. This system has in it for public callings a doctrine requiring equality and reasonableness.

Further, as to an isthmian canal, this doctrine has been assumed and recognized and asserted by the United States from the beginning.

Finally, this doctrine is the very essence of the words in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. If the treaty were silent as to the matter, the general law of England and the United States, and also the uniform recognition of the doctrine of equality in the past by the President, the Secretary of State, the Senate, and the House of Representatives would make it difficult to insist that mere silence in the treaty would authorize the opposite policy of discrimination; but the treaty deals with the matter expressly, and deals with it in harmony with what was to have been expected from the previous course of American and English law and of negotiation.

For the reasons given, it sems practically impossible not to come to the conclusion that the United States must give the services of the Panama Canal to all merchant vessels, and without discrimination and on reasonable terms.

Hence, as the analogies of the law prevalent in the United States and England require uniformity, and as the current of official declaration from the beginning requires uniformity, and as the treaty in force requires uniformity, the exempting—as distinguished from the subsidizing—of vessels engaged in the coasting trade appears to be impossible—impossible, because in this matter the United States, though free, like every sovereign, from the compulsion of ordinary court, has the honor to be in a place of responsibility, managing "a trust for mankind."

The Late Senator Money, of Mississippi.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. PAT HARRISON,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 26, 1913.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I desire to consume a portion of the time of this House in a discussion of the life, character, and public service of a distinguished citizen and great statesman.

It was indeed a dark day, filled with sorrow and anxiety for Mississippi, when on the morning of September 14, 1912, the news went forth that Senator Hernando De Soto Money, on the previous night, while walking down the front steps of his home, because of his feeble eyesight, had accidentally fallen and that his injuries were serious. The anxious citizenship of my State, as well as his thousands of admiring friends throughout the Nation, for several days thereafter watched with deepest interest the news items with respect to his condition in the hope that his condition would not prove fatal; but hope surrendered to deeper sorrow and anxiety gave way to tears when they learned that on Wednesday, September 18, his long public life had ended and the grim reaper had closed his eyes forever.

At the time of Senator Money's death he was but a private citizen, but for over 30 years his life had been devoted to the interest of his people and the public service of his country, and it was only to comply with his desire that the people of Mississippi did not continue him in the public service until his death.

Few men in the history of Mississippi have been so popular with the people of that State as H. D. Money. His long and eventful public life ended March 4, 1911, but under the laws of Mississippi it was necessary to choose his successor in the primaries in 1908. At that time Mississippi reposed in him a confidence akin to idolatry, as was shown by the fact that the two men in the public life of that State at that time to whom Mississippi was turning as his successor and who loomed higher on the political horizon than any others were JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, because of his unquestioned ability, ripe experience, and record as leader of the Democratic Party in the House of Representatives, and James K. Vardaman, who was the then governor and popular idol of the people of the State. Both of these gentlemen—who were afterwards elected to serve Mississippi in the Senate of the United States—publicly stated that should Senator Money desire to be reelected they would not offer themselves as candidates against him. His failing health, however, controlled his determination to give up public life, so he announced his intention not to offer for reelection and to retire to his beautiful home, Fair Haven, on the Mississippi coast, there to spend the balance of his days in the love of his family and surrounded by his friends in the quietude and peace of private life.

Hernando De Soto Money was born in Holmes County, Miss., August 26, 1839, and we are told that while a boy at school and a young man at the university of his State he possessed those qualities of indomitable courage, untiring energy, and indefatigable studiousness that characterized his long, honored, and brilliant life.

As a young man in the Army of the Confederacy his undaunted bravery, unbounded self-abnegation, intense patriotism, and unswerving loyalty made him an ideal soldier.

After the war he studied law and was admitted to the bar. He practiced his profession only a short time, but with such qualities of mind, energy, and courage as he possessed there is little doubt that his success in his chosen profession would have been assured; but he soon realized that the court room was too small a sphere for his wonderful talents, and he chose a wider field as a publicist and editor. For several years he published and edited the Winona Advance, and within a short time his wonderful store of information, his perceptive, descriptive, and analytical powers, and his fluency with the pen gave him high rank among the editors of the State. During this time he unceasingly took an active interest in the political affairs of the State and Nation, and constantly used his talents on the hustings and through the columns of his paper in behalf of his friends and in fighting the battles of the Democratic Party. It was at this time that Mississippi was undergoing the most crucial test in her history. It was then that the Republicans, carpetbaggers, and scalawags dominated the affairs of the State, and it was through the untiring efforts of such men as Money, George, Walthall, and others that these unwelcomed marauders were driven from power in the State.

Hernando De Soto Money's public service began in 1875, when he was elected to serve the people of his district in the Forty-fourth Congress. He was reelected without opposition for four terms, and declined to offer for reelection for the sixth term, in order that he might practice law in this city. He lived in Washington for eight years, practicing law, but retaining his citizenship in Mississippi and taking at all times a deep interest in the affairs of that State. In 1892 the Populists had grown strong in numbers in Mississippi, especially in the district formerly represented by Mr. Money, and it was necessary that the Democracy of that district should nominate its strongest man in order to win. A nominating convention was held, and the names of seven candidates were presented. A deadlock ensued. It was then that the people of the district induced Mr. Money to accept the nomination. He was elected to the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses, and in January, 1896, was elected by his State to the United States Senate for the term beginning March 4, 1899. In August, 1897, Senator J. Z. George died, and in 1898 Senator Money was elected to fill out the unexpired term, where he served until his voluntary retirement.

In the House of Representatives his greatest work was probably done while a member of the Committee on Post Office and Post Roads, for the betterment of the postal service. He looked upon the Post Office Department as the business branch of the Government and the one that was closest to the people, and for these reasons he took the deepest interest in familiarizing himself with every detail and in bringing about such laws and regulations as to make it of the most efficient service to all the people. He soon became recognized as an authority on this branch of the Federal service and was made chairman of that committee in the House, and no man, Mr. Chairman, in the history of this country has contributed more toward perfecting the Post Office Department than did Senator Money.

When he entered the Senate it was no easy matter to fill the place of J. Z. George, whose reputation for distinguished services and ability as a constitutional lawyer was nation wide. But Senator Money's wonderful store of information, his keen perception of great governmental problems, his aptitude for work, his genial disposition, his persuasive logic, soon won for him a high place in that body and commanded the respect of all Senators.

Whether it be foreign relations, agriculture, postal service, finance, or the tariff—indeed it might be said on any subject that might arise—he was master of it and had no superior.

In the Senate he served as a member of the Committees on Agriculture, Finance, Post Offices and Post Roads, and Foreign Relations. His wonderful information and ability within a few years won for him the leadership of his party in that body, and it was while Senator Money was leader of his party in the Senate that the Democratic minority in that body became more united and more militant than it had been for over a decade. His traits of character naturally stamped him as a leader. A strong intellect, resourceful mind, wonderful memory, simple manners, attention to duty, respect for the opinion of others, dominant courage, and legislative experience were only some of the characteristics of this great man.

He loved the South with a love begotten of the sacrifice he had made for it, but his patriotism was not confined to the South, not bound by sectional lines, for he was devoted to the interest of the people of every section of our common country.

One of the finest traits of this rich and varied character was that of his political courage. Having once made up his mind as to the course to be adopted, he pressed forward against every obstacle. Once convinced of the rectitude of his own purpose and the excellence of the measure he advocated, he did not hesitate or falter. He was not regardless of public opinion, but he did not compliment his opponents by yielding his own convictions, nor did he swerve one moment from the course he had chosen. If he were approached on any subject, his attitude was promptly made known. There would be no broken promises nor false hopes held out. "He never sold the truth to serve the hour." He hated hypocrisy, but respected the opinion of others who honestly differed from him.

Aside from honor, courage, loyalty to his friends and loved ones, the predominant characteristic of the man was his wonderful information and memory. No subject could arise in the Senate on which he was not thoroughly posted and could not discuss accurately and fully. If it were philosophy, his perceiving mind analyzed it with such logic that it convinced his hearers; if it were Grecian, Roman, or any other history, his accurate knowledge of dates and events was astounding; if it were religion or the Bible, his knowledge was profound; and if it were the history of our own country, his information was thorough, even to the most minute detail.

As a writer, he was clear and fluent; as a speaker, he was logical and convincing; as a conversationalist, he was interesting and entertaining.

While the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is filled with his discussions of many subjects and speeches in the House and Senate that have attracted national notice, probably no speech that Senator Money ever made was so sincerely praised and enthusiastically received by those who heard him as was a speech that he delivered in an executive session of the Senate in the Sixty-first Congress, where no record was kept. The Senate had gone into executive session to consider confirmation of appointments. A negro had been appointed by the President to some office in the South and a Senator from that State was speaking against the confirmation of the appointment. A question was asked the speaker by a northern Senator, which was not heard by the speaker but which provoked the Senator from Mississippi. Senator Money rose in his seat and requested the privilege of replying to the question. The request was granted and he began, and the more he discussed the question the more absorbed he became in the subject; so intense were his feelings that his power of speech became almost superhuman as he launched into a discussion of the South, her peculiar conditions, the negro problem, and the repeal of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Only a few weeks ago a distinguished gentleman who heard the speech told me that it was the most convincing, logical, and eloquent effort that he had ever heard in 30 years' experience in the Senate. He said that northern Senators were amazed and sat aghast, and southern Senators were bewildered and sat entranced. It was unanimously pronounced by the Senators who heard it as the greatest effort of Senator Money's career.

He was a Democrat of the old school. Progressive when reforms could be accomplished within the Constitution, but not a progressive in the sense of tearing down the Constitution. He was true at all times to the Democratic theory of government and was an intense partisan and party man. He believed in representative government as Jefferson wrote it and was slow to deviate from established Democratic principles in order to try out strange theories and new doctrines. He despised demagogy and was unacquainted with its arts.

Senator Money's devotion to his friends was steadfast and marvelous, uncircumscribed by any bounds. His heart was big, grateful, and sincere. His love for his family was indescribable. His most pleasant moments were when he was doing something for them. Moving to the coast of Mississippi some six years ago, and our homes being but a short distance apart, I became closely attached to him and learned to know him intimately and saw his sincere and tender family devotion. His children and grandchildren worshiped him. After the loss of his queenly wife in 1909 his sad and lonely moments found consolation and comfort in the presence of his devoted sons and charming daughters. When he was at his lovely Mississippi home, "Fair Haven," graced with verdant lawns, shaded by spreading live oaks, and adorned by beautiful magnolias overlooking the Gulf of Mexico, his daughters were almost constantly with him, attending him wherever he went. So attentive were they to his every wish that even after his retirement from public service, on account of his being a member of the National Monetary Commission and the Lincoln Memorial Commission, his duties occasionally called him to Washington, one of them would frequently accompany him. Often has he come to me in this House while on one of these occasional trips to this city, and as we walked off together to dine or to discuss current matters or affairs in Mississippi he would pull from the pocket next to his heart a letter from one of his daughters and because of his defective eyesight request me to read it to him. The tender and sincere sentiments of love expressed in them pleased him, and he would smile and involuntarily exclaim, "May God bless her."

If Senator Money had any ideals among the great men of this Nation they were Calhoun and George. He felt that Calhoun believed in the Constitution and the application of its powers in matters of legislation more nearly in keeping with his own ideas than any other man in the public life of our country. The idea of Mr. Calhoun "to restrict the powers of this Government within the rigid limits prescribed by the Constitution" was as a compass to Senator Money to guide his legislative course. It is not unnatural that he should have taken Senator George as an ideal. They were raised in the same little village in Mississippi. They had been intimate friends through life, as evidenced by the words expressed by Senator Money in his eulogy on the life and character of Senator George. He said: "My friendship had in it every quality of esteem, of respect, of admiration, of confidence, and of affection that could make the tie sacred and binding. Its spell is strong upon me, and though I should live to his ripe age it shall still blossom in my heart."

And, Mr. Speaker, it is indeed quite a coincidence that from the same little village of Carrollton, in the State of Mississippi, came two men who shed such luster upon her name, rendered such signal service to the State, and that these two men were such close friends personally and politically, one desiring that the other should succeed him in the Senate, and that after they had served their people so long and so faithfully should be laid to rest in the same beautiful little cemetery within only a few feet of each other.

Mr. Speaker, as I attended the funeral of this distinguished man and saw on that day the great concourse of friends that had gathered for miles, bowing their heads in sorrow, and saw the massive white vaults of George and Money only a few feet apart facing each other, the thought came to me that it was well that the spirit of these distinguished Mississippians should continue in death as they had in life, close together, and that the words said of Senator George by Senator Money might well be said of himself: "Entombed in the modest little graveyard at Carrollton? Aye, his body forgotten because out of sight? Ah, no. Morally brave? Look to his principles for an answer. Physically courageous? Consult his comrades of the bivouac. If you would know how true he was, ask his friends; if how fair, ask his enemies; if how great a man, ask his native country. In life he was able to defend his good name; in death it defends itself. And to detract from it is but to convict the detractor."

Panama Canal Tolls.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. KNOWLAND,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1913,

On the bill (S. 1653) to provide American register to the steam yacht Diana.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I take advantage of the opportunity given me to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD an article by Dr. Hannis Taylor, of this city, which appeared in the National Waterways Magazine, volume 1, No. 1.

This article is a distinct contribution to the American side of the argument over Panama Canal tolls. Dr. Taylor, who is a North Carolinian by birth, and who was at one time United States minister to Spain, is a leading authority on international law, being the author of many notable works. He received the degree of LL. D. from the Universities of Edinburgh and Dublin for his masterly History of the English Constitution.

Following the article of Dr. Taylor are inserted comments from newspapers upholding the position of this Government in the canal controversy which have come to my notice since February 6. On that day I inserted in the RECORD similar newspaper comments and resolutions from every section of the United States, favoring the provision of the Panama Canal bill granting free tolls to American ships in the coastwise trade, which occupied nearly nine pages of the RECORD. These clippings show that there has been no change of public sentiment, regardless of the campaign now being waged by the transcontinental railroads to bring about the repeal of the free-toll section of the Panama Canal act.

The article and newspaper comments are as follows:

When in the Senate of the United States a motion was made on July 29, 1852, to proceed to the consideration of a bill authorizing the exploration of the courses of navigation used by vessels proceeding to and from China, William H. Seward, then a Senator from New York, said that the settlement of the Pacific coast was still in a state of sheer infancy, despite the fact that steady streams of emigration were then flowing thither from every State eastward of the Rocky Mountains, from Australia, from the South American States, from Europe, and from Asia. That movement, he said, was not a sudden or accidental one, but one for which men and nature had been preparing for nearly 400 years. During that time merchants and princes had been asking how they could reach the East cheaply and expeditiously, that intercourse and commerce might be established between its ancient nations and the newer ones of the West. To those objects De Gama, Columbus, Vespucci, Cabot, Hudson, and other navigators had devoted their talents, their labors, and their lives.

Thus, with the eyes of a seer, he beheld the most sublime spectacle in the history of humanity—the reunion of the two civilizations, which, after having parted on the plains of Asia thousands of years before, and after traveling ever afterwards in opposite directions around the world, met and mingled again on the coasts and islands of the Pacific. Mastered and overcome by the great event, Seward exclaimed: "Who does not see that every year hereafter European commerce, European politics, European thought, and European activity, although actually becoming more intimate, will nevertheless ultimately sink in importance, while the Pacific Ocean, its shores, its islands, and the vast regions beyond will become the chief theater of events in the world's great hereafter?"

By the necessities of her geographical position Venice was forced to become a maritime power and to look to the East. The Venetians extended their commerce beyond Greece, Syria, and Egypt; they did some trade even with India. Before the Crusades ended it became usual for the Crusaders to take the fleets of Venice or Genoa to cross the Mediterranean, which cities alone had fleets of transport galleys in those days. The commercial supremacy of Venice thus built up was finally undermined through the discovery by the Portuguese of the route to India around the Cape of Good Hope, which enabled European traders to see India for themselves and to examine what were its products and its wants. Thus, ships could leave the ports of their owners in Europe, with a reasonable hope of reaching via the Cape the places to which they were destined, without transshipment or other intermediary obstacle.

The Portuguese, who thus gave to Europe a "new world" in the East, obtained Macao as a settlement from the Chineses as early as 1537, and their trading operations followed close on the discoveries of their navigators on the coast of Africa, in India, and in the Indian Archipelago. In our own time the Cape of Good Hope route, which 400 years ago destroyed the commercial supremacy of Venice, has become involved in a losing fight with the Suez Canal for the trade of the Orient. Another blow will be given in the same direction by the Panama Canal, with its saving of nearly 5,000 miles for American steamers, which will undoubtedly divert practically all our Australian traffic from the Good Hope route. And much European traffic will probably prefer the Panama route to the Good Hope route, where coaling stations are few and far apart and prices generally rather high.

At the end of 1910 the cash expenditure on the Suez Canal amounted to $126,642,406, the company having an outstanding capital obligation of $92,484,544. During that year the Suez Canal handled 4,533 vessels having a total tonnage of 16,581,898 net tons; the total receipts of the company for its canal service amounting to $25,168,400. Payments for fixed charges and for retiring capital obligations amounted to $6,072,602, while the cost of operating and maintaining the canal, plus appropriations to depreciation reserve, was $3,857,405. The balance of profits for 1910 was $15,908,419, the company paying a dividend of 31.6 per cent to its stockholders.

Suez Canal tolls are always reduced whenever the dividend exceeds 25 per cent. They are now $1.30 per net ton on ships with cargo and 82 cents per ton on ships in ballast, with a charge of $1.93 each for passengers older than 12 and half as much for those younger, children under 3 going free.

In the construction of the Panama Canal the American people will expend at least $375,000,000, about three times the capital cost of the Suez Canal. * * *

That our vast expenditure will be an immense benefit to European and Japanese shipowners there can be no doubt. From Europe the Panama Canal will save 6,000 miles on the present sailing distance to our Pacific coast ports, and 2,600 miles to points on the west coast of South America. While it will save nothing on the Suez route from Europe to Asia and Australia, from New York it will shorten the voyage to Hongkong by 89 miles, to Shanghai by 1,629 miles, to Melbourne by 2,656 miles, and to Yokohama by 3,729 miles.

A great readjustment of the ocean traffic routes of the commercial world, affecting directly or indirectly more than half the countries on the globe, will surely be brought about by the opening of the Panama Canal. Next to ourselves the Republics situated along the west coast of South America will be most benefited, hampered as they are now, because the only route available for them is the long and dangerous route by the Straits of Magellan, or the shorter but costly route over the Isthmus of Panama, with its double handling of freight.

In what way is our vast expenditure at Panama to become of pecuniary benefit to ourselves; in what way are we to make it an effective means to restore our American merchant marine to its ancient and rightful place on the high seas?

Between the canal and the transcontinental railroads a sharp competition for traffic is sure to arise. In a decision handed down last year by the Interstate Commerce Commission the inevitable conflict was indicated in the following terms: "The railroads, moreover, must soon meet with a competition by water more intense than any they have heretofore suffered, for within three years another route, one more important, searching, and determinative in its effect upon railroad rates than any other, will be opened—a route all water by way of the Panama Canal. The cutting of this canal will in effect bring the Straits of Magellan 3,500 miles to the northward, and with modern steamships it is estimated that San Francisco will by water be removed from New York but 14 days."

Thus the Panama Canal is to reopen a struggle between sea and land transcontinental traffic, which really ended in 1885, when the Sunset-Gulf route demonstrated its power to drive the clipper ships of America from the sea, and to sterilize the Pacific Mail, thereby rendering the Panama Railroad more of a curiosity than a connecting link in a great scheme of transportation. Between 1885 and 1891 the Sunset-Gulf route carried nearly ninety tons out of every hundred tons of freight that moved from the Atlantic seaboard to California. Thus the domination of the railroads between East and West was established by the man-made lines of steel which became the great trade routes across the continent.

Under present conditions American built and manned ships can not profitably compete with foreign ships. British and German built steamships cost no more than two-thirds as much as ships constructed in American yards. A good illustration is offered by the Atlantic Transport Line steamer Maine, built at Sparrows Point, Md., at a cost of $1,010,135, while her identical sister ship, the Michigan, was built in England at a cost of $647,640. Besides, it costs more to operate ships American manned.

As a Nation we are paying very dearly for having permitted American ships to be driven almost entirely out of international trade. In 1861 American ships in foreign trade had an aggregate tonnage of 2,496,894 tons, almost three times as much as now. In the seventies American ships carried more than 30 per cent of the imports to the United States. For 1911 it was only 10.2 per cent. Of our export trade for that year only 7.5 per cent was done in American ships. Of the total import and export trade for 1911 American vessels handled only 8.7 per cent. In 1870 they carried 35.6 per cent of such trade. For the fiscal year 1911 American ships carried only $280,206,464, or 8.7 per cent of the total sea-borne commerce of the country, which amounted for the year to $3,210,642,970.

It has been estimated that the sea-borne foreign commerce of the country paid American shipowners about $11,500,000 in a year, while it yielded to foreign shipowners some $135,500,000 during the same period. On June 30, 1911, the aggregate gross tonnage of American ships in foreign trade was only 863,495 tons, or 11.3 per cent of the total gross tonnage of the entire American merchant marine, the great bulk of which was engaged in coastwise and Great Lakes trade between American ports, a trade from which foreign ships are excluded by Federal law.

When the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of November 18, 1901, was promulgated, on February 22, 1902, what is now known as the Canal Zone was foreign territory. By the treaty made between the United States and Panama on November 18, 1903, that zone became the domestic territory of this country for all the purposes of international law. A radical change was thus wrought in the conditions existing at the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made. The leading English authority on international law, Hall, has thus described the conditions under which treaties cease to be obligatory:

"Neither party to a contract can make its binding effect dependent at his will upon conditions other than those contemplated at the moment when the contract was entered into, and, on the other hand, a contract ceases to be binding so soon as anything which formed an implied condition of its obligatory force at the time of its conclusion is essentially altered. If this be true, and it will scarcely be contradicted, it is only necessary to determine under what implied conditions an international agreement is made. When these are found, the reasons for which a treaty may be disregarded will also be found."

In my own work on international law I have stated my concurrence in Hall's view in this form:

"SEC. 394. A treaty may become voidable through subsequent events. After the validity of an international agreement has been firmly established by the concurrence of such antecedents, it may become voidable through the operation of subsequent events which might not have such an effect in the case of private contract. So unstable are the conditions of international existence, and so difficult is it to enforce a contract between States after the state of facts upon which it was formed has substantially changed, that all such agreements are necessarily made subject to the general understanding that they shall cease to be obligatory so soon as the conditions upon which they were executed are essentially altered."

Under that rule, which is a part of the settled international law of the world, the radical changes in subsequent conditions wrought by the transfer of the sovereignty over the Canal Zone to the United States rendered the Hay-Pauncefote treaty voidable, and subject to modification or abrogation, no matter what its original meaning might have been. "That a treaty is no more the supreme law of the land than is an act of Congress is shown by the fact that an act of Congress vacates pro tanto a prior inconsistent treaty." (Moore, Int. Law, Sec. V, p. 166.) As the Hay-Pauncefote treaty became voidable through a subsequent change in conditions, Congress had a perfect legal and moral right to modify it by legislation, no matter what its original meaning may have been.

But it is entirely unnecessary to resort to that line of argument, unanswerable as it is. Great Britain has not a foot to stand on when the treaty as written is fairly construed. By the treaty of November 18, 1901, it was agreed that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of April 19, 1850, should be superseded, to the end that the Panama Canal might be constructed under the auspices of the United States without impairing the "general principle of neutralization," which barred the United States from "any exclusive control over" any isthmian canal or railroad which might ever be built, and from "any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms" to Great Britain. Under the existing treaty the United States enjoys "the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal." It has provided that the canal "shall be free and open to the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects, in respect to the conditions or charges for traffic, or otherwise."

The right of the United States to control the entire subject matter is recognized in the treaty of November 18, 1903, between the United States and Panama, creating the Canal Zone, in the proviso that no costs shall be imposed on vessels, or upon the cargoes, crews, or passengers of vessels using the canal "except such tolls and charges as may be imposed by the United States for the use of the canal and other works." Under our navigation laws, existing when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made, foreign vessels were prohibited, then as now, from engaging in trade between American ports. Thus, in making the Panama Canal free to American vessels engaged in such trade there can be no discrimination, for they run in competition with no foreign vessels.

When we consider that we have performed this immense engineering feat at our own risk and expense, without the least help from any foreign nation; when we look upon our own canal, built across our own territory, at a cost of nearly $400,000,000—three times the cost of the canal at Suez—the British contention that we can not, without her consent, regulate our own coastwise traffic, in which no foreign nation can participate, becomes grotesque indeed. No wonder that the private interests antagonistic to the canal can not stimulate the British Foreign Office to make a real, whole-hearted protest. As the British claim is in every aspect repugnant to justice and common sense, it will die of inanition; it can never rise to the dignity of a real international controversy.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILROADS AT WORK.

A circular sent out, "not for publication," by a literary bureau in New York to newspaper editors and others, solicits opinions favorable to these propositions: That the Panama Canal bill is in contravention of our treaty with England; that it has "already gravely injured the prestige of our country abroad," and that the retention of the law "would compel us either to agree to arbitration, which could not honorably be refused, and with the certainty of defeat and consequent national humiliation, or to decline arbitration, which course not only would place us in a lamentable position in the eyes of the rest of the world, but would be a heavy blow to the arbitration movement." This literary bureau enterprise is paid for. Who hires the service? Who has a motive to subserve? Who is going to profit by the results, and what is the object? It is to bring to bear upon the public mind a massed opinion all on one side to mislead its judgment and betray the people into consenting to a monumental national blunder. The idea is to bring all this manufactured sentiment to bear upon Congress. The circular says: "Some Members who voted for it (the canal bill) have expressed their regret and their intention to vote for repeal." Evidently the interests behind the bureau are busily lobbying at Washington and have secured some recruits. This subterranean work is, however, characteristic of the representatives of the transcontinental railroads. A copy of the circular, evidently by mistake, was sent to the Star. The foregoing may be accepted as a reply.

NEW HAVEN OFFICER FIGHTS FREE TOLLS FOR PANAMA CANAL.

WASHINGTON, February 16.

T. E. Byrnes, vice president of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, is the first railroad man to appear in Washington with an acknowledgment of taking any part in the country-wide campaign to bring about the repeal of the law giving domestic commerce free tolls through the Panama Canal.

The campaign is for the benefit of the railroads. Mr. Byrnes's railroad controls all the rail and water transportation of New England, and if the law stands as passed will have to sell its vessel lines.

"The sentiment of the country is changing," said Mr. Byrnes to-day. "It is becoming apparent that the people are drawing around to the opinion that the treaty with Great Britain was violated in the passage of the Panama Canal act."

It was admitted here today by one competent authority that the railroads are bent not only upon the repeal of the free-tolls section of the law but that if they can reopen the matter they will make a tremendous effort to have cut out the provision forbidding the use of the canal to railroad-owned boats. Under this provision the New Haven road would have to dispose of its vessel lines.

PREDICTS TROUBLE FOR WILSON.

Mr. Byrnes has been here for several days looking into the situation, but he says he has obtained little light on what the disposition of the Democratic President will be, and therefore is not assured of the attitude of the next Congress. He feels that if Woodrow Wilson carries out his indicated tendency to be radical, he will run into a snarl with Congress, which is to contain many conservative Democrats.

One of the things Mr. Byrnes is doing to advance the interests of the railroads is to arrange for the building of public sentiment in New England. A public meeting on the subject of the Panama Canal is to be held by the New England Traffic Club on March 7, and Mr. Byrnes has been trying to obtain as speakers several Members of Congress known to be against free tolls for domestic commerce.

* * * * * * *

ROOT'S SPEECH BEING FRANKED.

The 75,000 copies of Senator ROOT'S speech for the repeal of the free-toll law, for the printing and addressing of which somebody is paying in the neighborhood of $5,000, have been rushed from the Senate document room at the rate of about 70 bags a day.

An effort has been made to ascertain to whom they are being addressed, but nobody about the Senate has means of knowing. The speeches are placed in unaddressed franked envelopes and are then shipped by mail in bulk to some concern in Philadelphia, where they are addressed and mailed to individuals.

As the bags in which they are sent to Philadelphia are franked, the Government has the opportunity of paying postage on them twice, and is thus made to work overtime in the interest of the propaganda to convince the people that a British treaty will be violated unless the railroads of the United States are permitted to add $1 a ton to their freight rates on shipments carried in competition with the Panama Canal.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer.]

THE CAT IS OUT OF THE BAG.

Mr. T. E. Byrnes is vice president of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad. Mr. Byrnes is now in Washington. He is not there on pleasure bent, but in the interest of his company. It is a business trip pure and simple.

It is Mr. Byrnes's intention to take an active part in the "campaign to bring about the repeal of the law giving domestic commerce free tolls through the Panama Canal." In doing so the gentleman is actuated by the purest of motives, of course. He fears the effect that "violating our treaty with England" will have abroad.

The fact that the New York, New Haven & Hartford will not be able to use the canal for its steamship lines will urge Mr. Byrnes to make a clean sweep of the whole matter and insist that if a change in the law is made it shall include the elimination of the provision forbidding the use of the canal to railroad-owned boats.

It looks as though the cat has succeeded in working out of the bag at last.

BUT ONE QUESTION IN DISPUTE.

Secretary Knox has replied to the English Government concerning the regulation of Panama Canal tolls. The dispatches state that it has been the effort of the honorable Secretary to reduce the matter in controversy to the fewest possible points of dispute, and upon that most everyone who has followed the matter intelligently stops to consider what the actual issues are. Such consideration must finally be fixed upon the interpretation of two words which occur in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and those words are "all nations." The British contention is for a literal interpretation; the American contention is for a common-sense interpretation.

Do these words include the United States, or do they except it? There is the real issue. Secretary Knox answers the question effectually. It is not proposed so to regulate tolls that rights which the shipping of any nation now enjoys shall be abrogated or curtailed. Unless the English contention shall prevail, there is no attempt anywhere to disturb existing rights. The tolls to be levied upon shipping are calculated to cover any deficiency by reason of the remission of charges to American ships, and it is only by the allegation of such arrangement that any degree of unfairness whatever could be charged. If we were to accept the English interpretation, which, in fact, is the American corporate interpretation, we would surrender a right which this Nation has always exercised with reference to its own shipping, and to say that the unconditional and unforeseen surrender of such a right is a question which we are called upon to arbitrate is stretching the doctrine of arbitration pretty far, even for the most pronounced friends of that doctrine.

It is not the repudiation of honor for the United States to stand pat upon the retention of so obvious a right. No one believed when the treaty was made that such a right was surrendered, and it should not be relinquished on the basis of shrewd bargaining and trickery. We may have no fear of war, for war never could be justified in the world's mind in support of such equivocation.

THE CANAL QUESTION.

Secretary Knox, in his reply to Great Britain's note on the Panama Canal tolls, assures England that domestic coastwise trade will not be permitted to extend operations into foreign competitive fields and that increased tolls will not be levied on foreign shipping to balance the remission to American ships. If this is not satisfactory, America proposes a commission of adjustment.

The United States in building the canal has taken up and will soon have completed an immense project of inestimable value to the world which one country attempted and failed and others have not cared to undertake.

Whatever arrangements may be made in the future regarding its use, no American citizen will feel wholly satisfied unless there is some certain recompense coming back to this country to pay at least the interest on the cost of construction in some way; for while the glory of the task may be great, there is also some very necessary considerations in the nature of dollars and cents, and it seems certainly only fair that the Nation which did the work should fare a little better as a result than those who are merely to enjoy the fruits of American enterprise.

Resolution unanimously passed by the Legislature of California protesting against the repeal of the free-toll provision of the Panama Canal bill.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Sacramento, February 15, 1913.

Hon. JOSEPH R. KNOWLAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Pursuant to the provisions of a joint resolution adopted at the first division of the fortieth session of the Legislature of the State of California I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON, Governor.

Senate joint resolution 14.

Whereas the Panama Canal, constructed by the United States in American territory, is a project belonging to the American people; and

Whereas the power to provide for the management, use, and control of said canal is an attribute of sovereignty, and as such is subject to exercise only by the Government of the United States, as provided in the Constitution and laws thereof; and

Whereas in the exercise of such power the Congress of the United States has enacted a law granting to American ships engaged in coastwise commerce of the Republic free passage through said canal; and

Whereas an attempt is being made to repeal said act: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to defeat all attempts to repeal said act; and be it further

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives in Congress requested to use all honorable means to defeat the repeal of said act, and that duly authenticated copies of these resolutions be transmitted by the governor of the State of California to the President and the President elect of the United States, and the presiding officers of the respective Houses of the Sixty-second and Sixty-third sessions of Congress, and also to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress in said sessions of Congress.

THE PANAMA DISPUTE.

Great Britain's formal protest against the Panama Canal regulations promises to bring the arbitration question again acutely to the front.

Earl Gray disputes the right of the United States to except its own vessels engaged in coastwise traffic from the canal tolls. He indicates decided opposition to the regulations excluding from the canal ships owned by railroads, or whose owners are guilty of violation of the Sherman antitrust law. Such rules, while applied by Congress against American vessels the same as all others, can not be enforced, Earl Gray contends, against British vessels or vessels owned by Canadian railroads. Such vessels may violate our laws, even our criminal laws, with impunity, so far as being excluded from the canal is concerned. * * *

The United States is the absolute owner of the canal and of the territory in which it is built. It was built entirely by the money of the United States, entirely on the initiative and under the control and direction of the United States. As President Taft has said: "The canal is ours. We own it. Our money built it. We have the right to charge tolls for its use." Great Britain disputes it. Great Britain goes further and asserts that we may exclude from the canal American ships whose owners violate our criminal laws, but we can not exclude British ships whose owners are guilty of like violation.

The question is whether the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty interfere with our free control of our own canal, just as Great Britain controls the Suez Canal. Many of our wisest statesmen and our foremost students of international law deny it absolutely. Great Britain affirms it. Shall the United States yield? Shall the United States, refusing to yield, consent that the dispute be arbitrated by an international tribunal most of whose members owe allegiance to some other Government whose interests in the controversy are adverse to those of the United States and identical with those of Great Britain?

THAT QUESTION OF GOOD FAITH.

It is astonishing to note the number of newspapers which are eagerly taking the attitude that the Government of the United States has deliberately violated its pledges and its good faith through the action of Congress in passing the bill granting the free use of the Panama Canal to American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. It is doubtful whether any other country in the world could find an equal number of newspaper men so anxious to take up the foreign side of any controversy in which their Government might engage and so eagerly intent on impugning the good faith of their own country.

* * * * * * *

The right of the United States to exempt its coastwise vessels from charges imposed upon foreign vessels has never been challenged, although it has made such exemption always, despite treaties which might be construed against such exemption. The case is absolutely identical in every detail with the case of Panama Canal tolls.

THOSE 400 OPINIONS.

Robert Underwood Johnson has collected 400 opinions of persons and newspapers, more or less prominent in the country, declaring against the dishonor of free American coastwise ships through the Panama Canal. Those opinions are all printed in quite a pretentious pamphlet, the typographical style of which indicates that it must have cost some money, and, indeed, a great deal of money, when we consider that it has been freely distributed all over the country. * * *

* * * If any one of these opinions had indicated how there might be discrimination where competition is impossible and can not be contemplated, or if they could show how passing through the canal free and on even terms with all ships that could possibly compete constitutes the payment of a bonus or subsidy in the true sense, then there would have been some force of logic in that pamphlet worthy of the expense.

As a matter of fact, the only discrimination possible is that which would obtain if this protest which helps no one but the transcontinental railroad interests should prevail. That discrimination would rob American shipping in the coastwise trade of a privilege it now enjoys. It would put a burden on ocean competition between the two coasts, which would partly save the day for the railroads, and that would be the sole effect. Our coastwise shipping interests would be handicapped, and the shipping interests of no other nation would be benefited in any way whatever.

It is not a question of national honor. It is a question of railroad profit.

FOREIGN IMPUDENCE.

The European powers appear to think that they have a perfect right to interfere in the operations of our Government, by way of protest, and to indicate their desires as to what we should do whenever they see fit. The example of the British Government in protesting against the Panama Canal law seems to be infectious, and the backing which that British protest received among our own people has evidently encouraged the European nations to believe that all they have to do whenever they do not like anything proposed by our legislation is to enter a protest against it in their own interest.

SENATOR ROOT'S SPEECH.

From the office in New York of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace comes this bit of information to the Inquirer:

"Senator ROOT'S speech before the Senate on the Panama Canal tolls question is being mailed you under separate envelope, franked. It is sent in the hope that you will find early opportunity to discuss it editorially with reference to the arguments and positions taken."

A great speech, no doubt, from its viewpoint. The Inquirer so regarded it at the time it was delivered and freely commented on it. But it expresses the views of the transcontinental railroads, those of the stranglers of independent steamship lines through the canal. It denies the right of the United States to control its own great enterprise. It grants to England the right to interfere with our own coastwise commerce.

Since the Inquirer believes that the Panama Canal belongs to the United States; that in the matter of tolls on coastwise American vessels the United States has full authority; that it is none of England's business what we do in this respect—since the Inquirer believes all this, we are sure that the Carnegie endowment will forgive us for not joining with it in holding Mr. ROOT up before the public as the representative of American patriotism. Or should we put in an application for a Carnegie medal for bravery?

[From the Tribune, Salt Lake City, Utah.]

THE BRITISH PROTEST.

The expected British protest against the Panama Canal toll bill has been received. * * * As President Taft has clearly indicated, we have a perfect right to free our own vessels altogether from canal tolls if we wish, not only vessels engaged in our coastwise trade, but our over-sea vessels; and it would no doubt be a long step toward upbuilding our merchant marine if we should decide to exempt all American vessels from Panama Canal tolls.

But we have not so decided. We have simply decided to exempt our coastwise shipping from those tolls; and since that coastwise shipping is not subject to foreign intrusion, since neither Great Britain or any other foreign nation has anything whatever to do with our coastwise shipping and has no opportunity to compete in it, but is expressly ruled out from all participation therein, it is indeed difficult to imagine on what basis Great Britain formulates any protest with regard to it. Undoubtedly the suggestion that the Canadian Pacific is at the bottom of the protest is the correct one, and the reason why the Canadian Pacific is opposed to our coastwise ships passing through the canal toll free is that these coastwise vessels will thereby be enabled to carry freights cheaper from the east coast to the west than they would be able to do if they had to pay tolls at the canal.

The only obligation that we have entered into with respect to foreign nations is that we will make no discrimination against one or any of them in the use of the canal, but that all will be treated alike in every respect in such use. A man or company may guarantee that much to any public or international use without penalizing himself in his own free use of his own property for his own purposes, and that is precisely the position of the United States, a position which it is impossible either for us to depart from or for any foreign nation to confute.

WHO OWNS THE CANAL?

Free tolls for American coastwise ships through Panama promises to reappear as an acute issue in this Congress.

* * * * * * *

The President and Congress should stand their ground. They have taken the right action. They should refuse to recede.

* * * * * * *

The note protests against denying use of the canal to railroad-owned Canadian ships, or to such ships that are violating the Sherman law. Here is probably the real animus of British opposition. It is the Canadian railroads and allied steamship lines for which Great Britain is solicitous, and the demand is for use of the canal by Canadian vessels on terms that are denied American coastwise ships.

* * * * * * *

Meanwhile, United States money is building the canal. United States money is paying the interest on the canal. United States money must underwrite the deficits of the canal. United States people must defend the canal. If an earthquake destroys it, United States citizens will have to pocket the loss of the canal.

Who owns the canal, anyway?

WHY ALL THIS HULLABALOO?

Secretary Knox's reply to the British protest against the Panama Canal law whittles the points in dispute down so small that one is inclined to exclaim, "Why all this hullabaloo?"

* * * * * * *

It ill becomes Senator ROOT, who has himself been in charge of our foreign relations, to embarrass his successor by furnishing ammunition to the British. As for the newspapers which voice the sentiments of Eastern financiers, nothing better could be expected of them. When the interests of these men coincide with those of a nation with which we are engaged in controversy we can always trust them to place their money bags before their country. That is why they are so generally distrusted in the country at large and why their opinions have weight in inverse ratio to the size of their fortunes.

Had not the interests of Canadian railroads in poaching on American commerce been adversely affected, there would have been no British protest. Had not American financiers seen that toll exemption would intensify water competition with transcontinental railroads, they would not have backed the protest. The controversy is not really between the American and British Governments; it is between the American people on the one side and the railroads, Canadian and American, on the other, which are using the British Government to fight their battles.

THE PANAMA AND SUEZ CANALS.

England's formal protest to the proposed Panama Canal act, which its foreign secretary, Sir Edward Grey, has transmitted through Ambassador Bryce to Secretary Knox, is more remarkable than convincing. It is but fair that Americans, before taking sides against their Government in its control of the Panama Canal, should understand that the clause in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty on which Great Britain bases its objection is literally and verbatim the same clause in the Constantinople agreement of 1888 on which Great Britain founds its authority for dominating the Suez Canal. This is the clause:

"The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

If, then, it is unjust and inconsistent with treaty rights for the United States to exempt from tolls its coastwise ships in Panama, it is equally unjust and inconsistent for Britain to discriminate in favor of all its vessels in the Suez, a thing it has continued to do since 1875. It will be difficult for England to press its point against us while claiming the right to which it objects for itself. France built the Suez Canal, but it fell into British hands 37 years ago, and since then has been as distinctly British as the Panama is American, though our Government bought the territory and built the canal at an initial cost of more than $400,000,000. If this clause in a treaty permits absolute British domination of the Suez, it ought not to abridge American rights to the control of our own property, so long as we violate no article of faith we have made with the world.

[From the Transcript, Boston, Mass.]

THE BOSTON TRANSCRIPT AND THE CANAL DISPUTE.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Zeal for one interpretation of the Panama Canal treaty, though it be a just one, should not lead the Transcript into injustice to the American merchant marine. Exemption from tolls at Panama was not asked for shipowners as such; this was the demand of manufacturers and merchants of the United States, including our Boston Chamber of Commerce. * * * Business men asked for the no-toll clause as a check upon the transcontinental railroads. The Transcript has only to consult the transportation committee of the Boston chamber to satisfy itself on this point.

* * * Nothing is to be gained by denouncing American ships in the coastwise trade as a "colossal," "bottle-fed" monopoly. Here in New England where American ships are still built and owned men know such a characterization to be ungenerous and untrue. There are 3,559,000 tons of American shipping on the Atlantic and 954,000 more tons on the Pacific coast, owned by thousands of separate owners, among whom monopoly has never been attempted and is impossible. Several competing lines, independent of each other and independent of railroads, are preparing to serve coastwise commerce through Panama. They do not have a "monopoly" even in this domestic commerce against foreign ships, for if their freight rates made the cost of a cargo of manufactured goods on the Pacific coast unduly high, such goods would be shipped not in an American vessel from Boston or New York but in a foreign craft from Germany or England. One-half in value and two-thirds in bulk of all our imports already enter American ports duty free, and whatever advantage American producers enjoy on the remainder will shrink or vanish on the opening of the canal under the revenue-only policy of the Wilson administration.

Great Britain within a few months has increased by an amount more than sufficient to pay the canal tolls the subsidy to the principal line of British steamers that will run through the canal from British ports to Puget Sound and San Francisco. If a similar line of American ships from Boston or New York is compelled to pay the canal tolls, the whole amount of those tolls will be a handicap not merely on our American ships but on the manufacturers and merchants of New England in their effort to make use of the canal to win a larger market in the States of the Pacific slope.

This plan, first opposed, is significantly not objected to in the latest British vote. How can it be when it is the actual policy in some form or degree both at Suez and at Panama of the British and other maritime Governments?

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

YONKERS, N. Y., January 25, 1913.

Editor the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin.

SIR: In to-day's leading editorial of the esteemed Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin I find the following statement:

"The amendment of the Panama Canal act so as to remove what Secretary Knox so ineffectively and unwisely defends would clear the atmosphere at once and set the United States right in the most honorable fashion. If this Congress will not so far be just to itself, it will be the first duty of the next to correct its error."

In view of the following declaration in the platform of the Democratic Party adopted last year, how do you think the next Congress will be made to see that its "first duty" will be "to correct" the alleged error of the present Congress:

"We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal."

The next Congress will be Democratic in both branches, in the House of Representatives by more than two to one. Will not the next Congress have a duty to the American people paramount to the one you suggest?

The Panama Canal bill containing the free-toll provision to which you object was passed by the present Congress in less than two months after that platform declaration that I have quoted, in which Congress were many men who participated in the adoption of the Democratic ntaional platform at Baltimore.

Will you say what, if any, real, tangible ground you have for expecting the next Congress will repeal a provision of law which those in control of the next Congress are on record publicly in a declaration of principles and policies as distinctly favoring?

The Progressive Party's national platform also says:

"We demand * * * that American ships engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls."

The Republican Party's national platform was silent on the subject.

The electors of the United States cast 10,398,023 votes for the principles and candidates of the parties thus publicly recorded as favoring the exemption of American vessels from the payment of tolls in passing through the Panama Canal, as compared with 4,502,406 votes cast for all of the other candidates and their declared principles. Between the time of the declarations quoted and the casting of those majority votes Congress enacted the bill providing for no tolls on vessels engaged in coastwise trade.

In advance of the passage of the Panama Canal bill Great Britain recorded her first official protest. So that, in voting so largely in favor of the parties recorded in favor of the exemption of vessels in coastwise trade from the payment of Panama Canal tolls the people were aware of Great Britain's opposition.

In all of these circumstances will you not explain on just what ground you expect the next Congress to repeal the free-toll provision of the Panama Canal act?

Respectfully, yours,

A. R. SMITH.

CANAL TOLLS AND TREATY.

From the telegraphic summaries of Secretary Knox's reply to the British protest against the Panama Canal bill, it appears that he has handled the question admirably. We commend his discussion of it to American opponents of the toll-exemption clause. A good many of these, we think, have been misled by noisily reiterated statements not very well founded. In preparing a state document, subject to the scrutiny of foreign diplomats and to be made the basis of further negotiations, the American Premier naturally had to keep within the record and the facts. Students of the question, therefore, will find instructive a comparison of his presentment with the statements and claims put forward by the persons and interests engaged in fighting toll exemption here at home.

* * * * * * *

The assumption that this Government, under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, deliberately surrendered its right to regulate the use of the canal as a facility of purely domestic commerce, is largely of American manufacture. As we understand it, the British note of protest does not advance a claim so broad. The phases of that note which Mr. Knox discusses deal rather with the possibility that the toll exemption may lead to incidental discriminations that would amount to a violation of the treaty terms. It is well for Americans to remember that these domestic exchanges are preliminary, and that most of what is said and written in opposition to the exemption clause amounts merely to expressions of private personal opinion. They can well afford to await an authoritative presentment of the points at issue and the true facts regarding them before reaching definite conclusions as to whether that much-discussed treaty strips their Government of authority over its domestic affairs exercised, up to this time, by every power.

[From the Pittsburgh Press.]

ENGLAND'S ATTEMPT TO DICTATE AS TO CANAL.

If anything was needed to cement public opinion throughout the country in favor of allowing American ships to pass toll free through the Panama Canal, it is supplied by the British Government's protest.

* * * * * * *

The truth of the matter is that the British proposition that British ships shall pay no more than our own ships pay is so preposterous as to answer itself. The language of the treaty and the intent of the treaty will unquestionably prove themselves plainly enough to all honest minds. There is a clause against discrimination, but it can have no possible reference to our own ships in a world of decency and common sense. We should be called a nation of dunces if we spent $600,000,000 in building a canal and then charged ourselves toll for using it out of fear that our unselfish (?) British cousins might accuse us of "discriminating."

The instant verdict of the country on the British note, leaving the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for the moment out of account, will be that Great Britain's demand is impudent. English ships pay tolls for passing through the Suez Canal, but the circumstances attending the construction and operation of that canal are as different from those attending the Panama enterprise as day is from night. That Great Britain will be permitted to twist the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty into the ridiculous meaning attached to it in the communication handed to our Government can not be believed. If the administration wished to yield to such arrogant dictation and agree to the monstrous principle on which that attempted dictation is based, public opinion would interfere and force our Government at any cost to assert the American rights in the premises.

There has been considerable sentiment heretofore in favor of letting all shipping, foreign as well as our own, go through the canal free. To that sentiment the effrontery of the British Government has put an end.

The Late Senator Taylor, of Tennessee.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. SAM R. SELLS,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 23, 1913,

On House resolution 864, paying tribute to the memory of Hon. ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR, late a Senator from the State of Tennessee.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I can not permit this opportunity to pass without offering a word of tribute to the life and character of Tennessee's distinguished son, Senator ROBERT L. TAYLOR. It is my fortune to represent in this House the first Tennessee district, which he represented also when but a boy, and which service was the beginning of a long and honored career in the political life of his State and Nation. It is also my fortune to live in the community where he was born and grew to early manhood, and it is there, as I believe, that his true character is best known and most appreciated.

Senator TAYLOR came from a noble ancestry, native to east Tennessee, and who for a hundred years have assisted in making its history. They stood with "Old Hickory" at New Orleans; they pushed back at the point of the bayonet the savage from the frontier, starting the course of empire westward on its way, and resulting in one brief century in the greatest Nation the world has ever known.

His father, N. G. Taylor, several times represented the same district in Congress, was honored many times with important official positions, and his influence and persuasive eloquence were largely responsible for the loyalty of east Tennessee to the Union during the dark days of 1861 to 1865.

On his mother's side were the Hayneses, many of whom have served their State with honor and distinction. His uncle, Landon C. Haynes, will long be remembered as one of the greatest orators that Tennessee ever produced, and whose orations have been declaimed by every schoolboy of the State. With such a lineage, it is no wonder that BOB TAYLOR should have climbed to eminence. His oratorical powers were inherited, but cultivated to a superlative degree by years of experience on the stump and the platform. He made the first political speech that I ever heard, and from that time until he died I never lost an opportunity to hear him. He charmed me with his address as no other has ever done, and I doubt if, as a political orator, Tennessee ever produced his equal. Time and again his party called on him for help and leadership in times of dire distress, and, be it said to his everlasting credit, he never failed to heed the call. When he was leading Democracy's hosts but rarely failed to follow.

In 1910 his party was rent with factionalism, and in August of that year had suffered defeat at the polls by a majority of approximately 50,000. At such a crisis he was selected as the only Democrat in Tennessee with the remotest possibility of election as governor. He was defeated by a narrow margin after a campaign that will be memorable in Tennessee history. His enemies, and they were few, have been wont to attribute his defeat to the loss of his popularity and his power to lead. In my judgment his qualities of leadership never shone more resplendently, nor were the powers of his personal magnetism ever more amply demonstrated, than in this campaign. Senator TAYLOR practiced none of the tricks of the professional politician—he did not need them. He knew but little of organization, and cared less. He was ready at all times to take his case directly to the people. In them his confidence never faltered, and it was in fullest measure returned. He may not have attained those heights of statesmanship which some have reached, but, what was better still, he built for himself an enduring home in the hearts and love of his countrymen.

If he had a weakness it was his utter inability to avenge a wrong. Readiness to forgive was fundamental in his character. And he loved all men. I know not to what religious sect he belonged, but I do know that he, more than any man I have ever known, followed closely the divine injunction, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." And this, I believe, is the true religion, and has its being only in the love of God.

Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold;
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the Presence in the room he said,
"What writest thou?" The vision raised its head,
And with a look made all of sweet accord,
Answered, "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the angel. Abou spake more low,
But cheerily still, and said, "I pray thee, then,
Write me as one who loves his fellow men."
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came with great awakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blessed,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

Senator TAYLOR was in public life for a period of perhaps 40 years, as Representative in Congress, three times governor of his State, and United States Senator. And these were troublous times in Tennessee politics, but as a member of a political party that always opposed him I stand in this presence with uncovered head to say that no man ever seriously impugned his honor or questioned his integrity, and the same could be truthfully said of his father, N. G. Taylor; his uncle, Landon C. Haynes; and his brother, Alfred A. Taylor, all of whom rendered long and distinguished service to their party and their State.

His death has left a place that will not soon be filled. In the mountain cabin and in the mansion of luxury there is mourning over his departure. In many a heart there is an aching void that his cheery laugh and his kindly voice will be heard no more. But—

I can not say, and I will not say,
That he is dead—he's just away;
With a cheery smile and a wave of the hand
He has wandered into an unknown land,
And left us dreaming how very fair
It needs must be since he lingers there.

The Value of Irrigation of Agriculture in Arid and Semiarid Climates.

OF

HON. JOHN E. RAKER,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 28, 1913,

On the bill (H. R. 28283) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the question of irrigation of arid and semiarid lands is one of the most important economic questions that now or ever has affected the great western portion of the United States. This is especially true as it relates to the arid and semiarid regions of the Rocky Mountain and Pacific coast country. The actual and material value of the irrigation of arid and semiarid lands was supposed to be conceded without any dissenting voice. The testimony on this question had all been one way. It came as a great surprise to the friends of irrigation, when Dr. Galloway appeared before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture and attempted to make it appear to the contrary. The following is the statement made by Dr. Galloway, Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, before the Committee on Expenditures of the Department of Agriculture:

The CHAIRMAN. Then, as a matter of fact, some of the land that is being reclaimed is also being lost to agriculture.
Dr. GALLOWAY. Yes, sir; that is true.
The CHAIRMAN. To any marked degree?
Dr. GALLOWAY. To a marked degree.
The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact do irrigated lands have their problems which affect their own life and production to a degree that humid lands have?
Dr. GALLOWAY. Far more so, in my judgment. I will even go so far as to say what I have said before, that as far as I know there has never been any long-continued successful irrigation agriculture in any arid climate anywhere in the world.

I have been intimately connected with irrigation development in the West for over 25 years, and I am in possession of no facts that would justify the foregoing statement.

It is true, irrigated agriculture has its problems and calls forth, and perhaps demands, a higher order of intelligence than that required for farming in a humid country, for the reason that one more important element—water—is largely in control of the husbandman.

It is also true that a small percentage of irrigated lands has become water logged by a wasteful use of water, but the remedy is one of drainage and is not difficult to apply.

The statement of Dr. Galloway should not be permitted to go unchallenged. The experience of those actually interested and engaged in irrigation of agricultural lands from the beginning of civilization gives evidence of the actual value of successful irrigation of agricultural lands in arid and semiarid climates of the world. Having lived in a part of the country where irrigation and its benefits have been observed for 30 years, I feel it my duty to present some remarks upon this most important subject. It is a lamentable fact that the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry should go out of his way to make such a statement, without any apparent facts to back it up, or upon which it could be based.

From history it has been shown conclusively that for thousands of years there has been long-continued successful irrigation of agricultural lands in arid and semiarid climates of the world. The investigation of the value of irrigation for the last 50 years and more by men fully qualified therein, and who have given much thought and investigation thereto, fully and completely demonstrates what history has already fully shown on this important subject—that there has been and is now long-continued successful irrigation of agricultural lands in arid and semiarid climates of the States and in many other places in the world.

If this is not true, then the cherished and fondest hopes of many enthusiastic irrigationists will be forever blasted.

This Government alone is now spending over $90,000,000 in establishing national reclamation projects to irrigate millions of acres of desert lands. Private individuals and companies, as well as the Western States, are expending millions of dollars each year on irrigation. Irrigation of agricultural lands in arid and semiarid climates has now been firmly established. Its worth and immense value is permanently demonstrated, and will not now be uprooted by any voluntary statement by him who does not know whereof he speaks.

Few men living to-day possess so accurate a knowledge of soils as Dr. Hilgard, late director of the California Experiment Station. In his book on Soils he makes the following comparison between arid and humid soils:

In humid countries, as is well known, cultivation can only in exceptional cases be continued profitably for many years without fertilization. But fertilization requires a somewhat protracted development of agriculture to be rationally and successfully applied in the humid regions, and the Germanic tribes like the North American Indians, seem to have shifted their culture grounds frequently in their migrations. No such need was felt by the inhabitants of the arid region for centuries, for the native fertility of their soils, coupled with the fertilizing effects of irrigation water bringing plant food from afar, relieved them of the need of continuous fertilization, while in the humid regions the fertility of the land is carried into the sea by the drainage waters through the streams and rivers, causing a chronic depletion which has been made up for by artificial and costly means. What with the greater intrinsic fertility and the great depth of soil available for plant growth, much smaller units of land will suffice for the maintenance of a family in arid countries. * * *
The black cotton soils of India, notably the Deccan, have been cultivated without fertilization for 2,000 years and are still fairly productive.
* * * * * * * *
In America the inhabitants of the high dry plains of Arizona and New Mexico were, as their descendants of the Pueblos are to-day, superior in social development to their forest-dwelling neighbors of the Algonquin race. From time immemorial they have practiced irrigation in connection with cultivation, maintaining a comparatively dense population on very limited areas.

This opinion of Dr. Hilgard is corroborated by Prof. B. C. Buffum, who for years was director of the Wyoming Experiment Station. I quote the following from his work on "Arid Agriculture":

Irrigation and soil fertility. Fertility is measured by the power of the soil to produce crops. As we have shown, moisture is an essential element of fertility. Other elements are nitrogen and minerals, which are direct plant foods. In much of the irrigated region the waters used contain large amounts of dissolved fertilizing elements. It has been shown that waters that contain much silt carry with them large amounts of dissolved plant foods. Studies of the waters used in irrigation from the Rio Grande River showed that where water was used to the depth of 1 foot it deposited 955 pounds of potassium, 58 pounds of phosphoric acid, and 53 pounds of nitrogen to each acre. This would be a sufficient supply of nitrogen for more than 30 bushels of wheat per acre, enough phosphoric acid for 30 bushels per acre, and enough potassium to last for 30 years, if as much wheat was raised on the land each year. Such large amounts of soil fertility are unusual, however, but even our clear waters from mountain streams carry with them a considerable amount of silt and plant food in the late spring and the early summer. Under irrigation such large annual crops are taken off the soil that the subject of available plant food becomes an important one. Our soils will wear out unless a good farm practice is inaugurated which will keep them productive. With a proper system of cropping and rotation, adding plant food to the soil in the form of barnyard manure, the waste of feed pens, green manure, and growing of leguminous crops will keep the soils always richly productive. Only in special locations or with special crops will the use of any artificial fertilizer be found advisable.

In an address delivered before the National Irrigation Congress at Chicago in 1911 Dr. Fortier, Chief of Irrigation Investigations, United States Department of Agriculture, referred to the importance of irrigation to Western States in the following manner:

IMPORTANCE OF IRRIGATION TO WESTERN STATES.

Those of you who have watched the rise and progress of the Commonwealths throughout the Rocky Mountain and Pacific coast regions must have observed how large a part irrigated products now bear to the total revenue. Unlike mining, which has unearthed countless millions by the toil of the many, but has allowed nearly all of this vast wealth to pass into the hands of the few, leaving the original toiler stranded and helpless, irrigation builds up enduring Commonwealths by establishing homes on the land and by fostering a high order of citizenship, good institutions, and a stable government.

Irrigated agriculture lies at the foundation of much of the material prosperity of the West. Through the agency of water wisely used, deserts are converted into productive fields and orchards, and flocks and herds and prosperous communities take the place of wild animals and an uncivilized race. It also furnishes food and clothing for the dwellers in cities, raw material for the manufacturer, and traffic for the transportation company. If it were possible to remove from the arid region the comparatively small area which has been rendered highly productive by means of irrigation, it would go far to undo the labor of half a century in building up the western half of the Union.

The census for 1910 gives the population of the 17 States and Territories lying west of the Missouri River at nearly 16,500,000. This is an increase of 42 per cent in 10 years. In the same time the rate of increase throughout the remaining 31 States was only 17 per cent. I often look upon the trend of population from east to west in this country as bearing some resemblance to the passage of raw material through a mill. The raw material is dumped into the hoppers of the immigrant-seeking States of New York and Pennsylvania, and the finished product emerges on the Pacific coast and the slopes of the Rockies. This is indeed fortunate for the West, for if there is any place where the quality of the man counts it is on an irrigated tract.

The progress of irrigation development may also be measured by the amount of money invested in irrigation works. The census figures for 1910 place this amount at nearly $305,000,000. Dividing this sum by the total acreage irrigated, gives $22 as the average price per acre of irrigation works, such as reservoirs and main canals. This, however, does not include the expenses incurred by the farmer in installing head ditches and laterals and preparing his land for irrigation. These expenditures would easily average another $20 per acre, raising the total to something over $40 per acre, and giving us a grand total of approximately $600,000,000 of capital invested.

Large as this sum may appear, it is yet small when compared with the wealth created by the water which such works have provided. If one reckons the cost of irrigation works in millions, he should use billions as a unit to reckon the values created by the water which they furnish. A relatively small amount of capital is invested in the pumping plants and canals of the Santa Ana Valley, in California, but the purchase of the citrus orchards and other improvements which this pumped water has created would entail an immense outlay. The irrigated lands of few localities possess such high values, but the comparison is true for all irrigated districts.

The history of irrigation the world over shows that the fertility of the soil under this method of farming can be maintained unimpaired for thousands of years. It is only when the reservoirs which store the water and the canals which distribute it to the land are destroyed by revolutions or neglect that once fertile valleys revert to desert conditions. This is clearly shown by Mr. Mackenzie in lecturing to the students of the University of Oxford on the subject of irrigation in Mesopotamia. I extract the following from one of his lectures:

The practice of irrigation is of very great antiquity, and one of the earliest examples of irrigation works of which we have record is of interest as illustrating not only the prosperity which accompanies a well-managed irrigation system, but also the ruin and desolation which, in a country dependent on irrigation, inevitably follow neglect of the proper maintenance of its irrigation works. The country referred to is Mesopotamia, and particularly the alluvial plain in the southeast lying between the Euphrates and the Tigris and which is known to us as Chaldea, or Babylonia. Much of the history of Chaldea has been deciphered from local inscriptions, and not the least interesting are those relating to irrigation. These inscriptions fully bear out the statements of comparatively recent historians, of whom perhaps the most trustworthy is Herodotus. The whole of Chaldea is described by Herodotus as densely populated and thickly studded with great cities, and the cultivation of the country was regulated by large canals, of which the three principal carried the waters of the Tigris toward the Euphrates, above Babylon. Such was the fertility of the soil that grain yielded, as a rule, a two hundred and occasionally a three hundred fold return to the cultivator, and Pliny mentions that two crops of wheat could be reaped annually.

* * * * * * *

As irrigation was the foundation of Babylonia's prosperity, so was the want of irrigation the chief cause of her decline. In the course of centuries the canal system of Babylonia suffered many vicissitudes. Time and again the canals were ruined by floods or by neglect of the works, but it was not until the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries of our era that the irrigation system received its deathblow, during the troublesome times of the invasions of the country by the Mongols and Tartars. With the destruction of the canals cultivation became impossible, and Babylonia rapidly sank into the state of barren desolation which it now presents.

Mr. R. B. Buckley, in writing on irrigation in Egypt, says:

One of the oldest canals in the world—if, indeed, it is not actually the oldest now in operation—is the Bahr Yusef in Upper Egypt. Tradition relates that the canal was constructed by the patriarch Joseph (Yusuf) in the days of the captivity. It was originally an inundation canal, but after various alterations and improvements to its off-take on the Nile is has now been made perennial by the construction of the Ibrahimiyah Canal. The discharge of this canal is probably the largest in the world. In August and September it has been known to carry 32,000 cubic feet a second. It has a bed width of about 180 feet and has a depth of about 30 feet when the Nile is in full flood.

The same author, in speaking of the earliest canals in upper India, says:

The earliest canals in upper India of which any records exist are the old canals taking off from both banks of the Jumna. The one on the west bank in the Punjab is attributed to the Firuz Shah, who about the middle of the fourteenth century is said to have cut a canal to irrigate his favorite hunting grounds near Hissar. The canal seems to have fallen into disrepair, but in the sixteenth century the Emperor Shah Jahan carried the canal by aqueducts and deep-rock cuttings into Delhi. The eastern Jumna Canal, on the other bank, was originally commenced by the Shah Jahan about the same time as he undertook the extension of the canal on the other bank to Delhi. When the English came into possession of the country these old works were in ruins, but their restoration and improvement were very soon taken in hand. One of the earliest systems which was projected by the British after the annexation of the Punjab was the Bari Doab Canal, lying in the doab between the Ravi and the Boas Rivers. There had in this case also been a small canal in the district prior to the British occupation, which was also one of the Shah Jahan's works, undertaken in the early part of the seventeenth century.

The upward trend of production in 11 of the Western States, where irrigation is most practiced, may be seen from a review of the Agricultural Yearbook of 1911. This review gives 10-year averages, during the past 40 years, of the principal crops raised in the western division of the United States.

Naval Appropriation Bill.

SPEECH

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. CARY,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1913,

On the conference report on the bill (H. R. 28812) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, in support of the bill I offered as an amendment to the naval bill, to wit:

That Congress must offer proper compensation and protection to witnesses when they furnish evidence by which the Government may recover a part of the hundreds of millions of dollars of which it may have been defrauded.

Documentary conclusive evidence shows that the Navy Department has not been frank with Congress, and the department has sent misleading reports, and in place of facts of the utmost importance the department has rendered their dishonest opinions, manifestly intending to mislead Congress and the country.

This is certainly a grave affair, because we are building our Navy upon lines as advised by men that have deceived Congress for 14 years about the effect of high explosives, which is the most important science in naval warfare.

Now comes the Navy Department again and asks for more money for battleships, in the face of facts that the country has been deceived for many years; in fact, I will bring evidence that our country has been officially defrauded.

Therefore, I maintain it is nothing short of a crime to build more battleships upon lines as advised by disloyal officers and officials, because it is not only wasting public money, it is also jeopardizing the lives of our brave officers and men; in fact, it is jeopardizing the safety of our Navy.

I first refer to the Isham high-explosive shell test against our battleship Puritan about two years ago:

(a) The Navy Department did not make this test voluntarily, but was compelled to make it by Congress.

(b) Evidently the Navy Department selected a vessel which they thought could withstand the attack of a high-explosive shell, if any battleship could.

(c) The test was even unfair, because the Isham shell was placed between 2 and 3 feet above the water line on the armor belt.

Still the Puritan did sink in a few minutes, as a result of the impact of a single high-explosive shell.

Comparing the efficiency of this test of high explosives with armor-piercing shots, I refer to the test against the battleship San Marcos. It took two days' bombardment of armor-piercing shells to sink the San Marcos. This would mean that if as many high-explosive shells had been used properly as they fired armor-piercing shots at the San Marcos, they would be sufficient to disable all the battleships in our Navy.

But I will have to bring far more serious facts: The Ordnance Bureau has made deliberately false reports to the Secretary of the Navy and to Congress of the most important facts as to tests and results ever accomplished on our Government proving grounds, which the following facts and documentary evidence conclusively prove:

A. R. Couden, commander, United States Navy, and inspector of ordnance in charge of naval proving grounds, reported, under date of May 19, 1898, to the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, that under Gathmann's directions and system a test was made at the proving grounds which resulted in the destruction of a 17-inch turret plate. This armor, about the heaviest and strongest used, was destroyed by an outside explosion of a single Gathmann high-explosive shell. No recognition of the result in said test was ever definitely or adequately reported to Congress.

The first mild statement to Congress of this test, resulting in the demolition of this 17-inch turret plate, was on or about February 18, 1905, or about seven years after Gathmann destroyed said armor plate.

Please note that only then was it reported at all because the Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, submitted a resolution in Congress asking for a report of this identical test and result.

As documentary evidence I refer to said resolution, and I quote the same (58th Cong., 3d sess., resolution No. 491, February 10, 1905):

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is respectfully directed to send to the House of Representatives such information as is in his possession relating to experiments with Gathmann guncotton shells upon plate armor and other resistants, whether at Indianhead or elsewhere, under the supervision or under the cognizance of the Navy Department or of naval officers detailed for purposes of inspection. The Secretary is especially requested to give the House of Representatives such information as he may possess concerning the alleged complete demolition of 17-inch turret plates by the detonation of 500-pound guncotton projectiles, Gathmann system, at Indianhead on May 14, 1898.

Referring to the demolition of said 17-inch turret armor on May 14, 1898, I refer to a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Navy of February 18, in response to said inquiry of the House, and which became House Document No. 353, Fifty-eighth Congress, third session. Please note, this is about seven years after Gathmann had destroyed the 17-inch turret armor and Charles O'Neil was no longer Chief of Ordnance. The report asked for is found on pages 4 and 5 of said document and is as follows:

(No. 314.)

NAVAL PROVING GROUND,
Indianhead, Md., May 19, 1898.

CHIEF OF BUREAU OF ORDNANCE,
Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Referring to the bureau's indorsement No. 4483, I have the honor to report that the experiment of exploding 500 pounds of guncotton against an armor plate has been made. Mr. Gathmann, his son, and Mr. McMullen, of the Gathmann Projectile Co., were present. The plate used was a piece of the 13-inch B. L. R. turret ballistic plate, representing group 4, of the armor for the Kentucky and Kearsarge. The part used was the left half shown on photograph No. 689 N. P. G. Its thickness varied from 16 to 17 inches. Its weight was about 45,000 pounds.

The plate was on the river bank north of the valley, against a bluff, resting on timbers, held in position by chains secured to the hill above. The earth was dug away from the immediate rear of the plate.

The guncotton was packed closely in a stout cubical oak box 26 inches in the clear, made at the navy yard under the direction of Mr. Gathmann. There were five spaces in the interior of the box, four of light pine. The central one was about 6½ inches square; the four others, dispersed symmetrically about the central one, were 6 by 1½ inches. The central air space was about half filled with guncotton; the others were more nearly filled.

The wet guncotton used was 810 cakes of Du Pont's manufacture, sent here for that purpose. The weight of a cake was seven-tenths of a pound; total weight of wet guncotton, 560 pounds; estimated weight of dry guncotton in main charge, 496 pounds (11.4 per cent water). The dry guncotton primers were supplied by Mr. Gathmann and weighed 4 pounds. These were placed in four thin boxes prepared for them at the rear of the main charge and so let into the main box as to be closely surrounded by the wet guncotton. The four primers were on diagonals of the base about equidistant from the center and the corners. The four fulminate detonators were of the torpedo-station type, and each contained 35 grains of fulminate of mercury. These were connected in series and were fired by service gun batteries.

The box had no cover. This open side was so placed that contact was made between the wet guncotton surface and the armor plate. The box rested on timbers so as to retain its position at about the central portion of the plate.

Referring to photograph 689 N. P. G., what is then the left edge of the plate was for this experiment the bottom, making the line of fracture of the original plate now the top.

There were on the beach two 3-inch plates secured in an upright position, remaining there from a former experiment. The armor plate was between the two, 19 feet distant from one and 24 feet distant from the other.

On making the electric connection there was a loud but not specially sharp report. There was, however, a distinct shock, but not more than comes from a very heavy gun, an immense cloud of very black smoke, and considerable débris from the gravel, dirt, and adjacent timbers.

The armor plate was broken into two approximately equal parts, each part falling flat on the ground, the fracture running vertically as the plate stood. The left portion was turned over as a door opens, making what was the rear of the plate now the upper part.

The other piece was turned as on an axis normal to the surface through about 180 degrees. This position of the parts is probably due in a large measure to a landslide of the earth right in the rear of the plate, which was started by recent rains, and the work of getting the plate in position; it was all ready to fall, and completely buried the plate and extended several feet beyond the original position of the plate. Its force was sufficient to move the parts of the plate about.

The upright 3-inch plate situated 19 feet from the guncotton charge was lifted and driven 48 feet, resting above the sea wall toward the old bombproof. The plate was much bent, and a piece 3 by 2 feet was torn from the nearest end. The plate and structure 24 feet distant was entirely uninjured.

Photographs in duplicate are forwarded herewith. No. 694 shows the plate and charge just before explosion, No. 695 the scene immediately after explosion, and No. 696 after the dirt had been moved, showing the fragments of the plate.

Very respectfully,

A. R. COUDEN,
Commander, United States Navy, Inspector of Ordnance in Charge.

True copy:

E. S. BRANDT,
Chief Clerk Bureau of Ordnance, Navy Department.

Please note, Commander Couden belittled this test as much as he could, because the bureau was opposed to such a test.

Still Mr. Couden admits (a) that Mr. Gathmann was present; (b) that the armor was from 16 to 17 inches thick and its weight was about 45,000 pounds; (c) that Mr. Gathmann furnished a primer; (d) Du Ponts furnished the guncotton; (e) the armor plate was broken; (f) the left portion was turned over as a door opens, making what was the rear now the upper part of the plate; (g) the other piece was turned as on an axis, normal to the surface about 180°, and photograph No. 696, after the dirt had been removed, showing the fragments of the plate.

I may add the armor was far stronger than the belt armor of any battleship; and what would become of a battleship with her side "open like a door" in her belt armor extending from 3 to 6 feet below the water line?

On or about May 9, 1900, Admiral O'Neil and the Secretary of the Navy attempted to deceive the Senate on the effect of high explosives; as evidence I refer to Senate Document No. 343, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session. This report was in reply to a resolution of the Senate dated May 7, 1900. I quote the letter from the Navy Department, dated Washington, May 9, 1900:

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE UNITED STATES SENATE.

SIR: Replying to the resolution of the Senate dated the 7th instant, requesting that the Secretary of the Navy send to the Senate report of all experiments with the Gathmann torpedo shell and gun, I have the honor to inclose herewith copies of the report of experiments therein called for.

Very respectfully, JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

Please note the report of Commander Couden, to wit: The destruction of a 17-inch turret armor by Gathmann is, in spite of this resolution of the Senate, withheld or suppressed. It will be seen that the Senate document contains 52 pages, containing many matters of no importance whatsoever; but the most important test, fact, or demonstration ever made on our Government proving grounds was suppressed in defiance of this resolution of the Senate. By destroying a 17-inch turret plate with a single high-explosive shell Mr. Gathmann established a fact of the utmost importance to our Government, to Japan, and the world, to wit, that armor gives no protection to battleships against guns which throw large shells of high explosives and detonate the same promptly on impact. This our ordnance officers and our Secretaries of the Navy know as well as any man of ordinary intelligence after Gathmann had destroyed this 17-inch armor, and yet they suppressed any report of this vitally important test and result. It seems that there must have been collusion, or that they conspired to favor the armor manufacturers of the Steel Trust, as it can not be assumed that Admiral O'Neil and the Secretary of the Navy would have violated their official oath by making misleading reports to Congress for deception only.

As evidence of the unreliability of some of these official reports I quote Admiral O'Neil's report in the letter to the Secretary of the Navy, May 9, 1900, page 15, last paragraph:

In fact, it may be fairly said that the only useful result which has been attained by so large an expenditure of money in experiments for the Gathmann Co. has been the proof that the destructive effect of very large quantities of guncotton against structures is vastly less than has been commonly supposed.

Respectfully,

CHARLES O'NEIL,
Chief of Bureau of Ordnance.

First, the Gathmann tests, he reports "that the destructive effect of very large quantities of guncotton against structures is vastly less than has been commonly supposed," when, as a matter of fact, these Gathmann tests conclusively proved that the heaviest armor and the strongest battleship construction known to warfare was in less than a second completely destroyed by a single Gathmann shell.

Therefore, it is self-evident the Ordnance Bureau is making false reports on facts, and in place of facts they rendered their dishonest opinions, manifestly intended to mislead Congress and the country. Why? For the benefit of the Steel Trust?

At all events, the evidence is conclusive that in these matters we can not depend on official reports from the Navy Department at all.

It may be true that the result obtained by Mr. Isham and Mr. Gathmann are not entirely due to the force of high explosives, but also to the fact that our battleships are protected by very inferior, cheap armor. It is commonly understood that the best armor costs about $200 per ton to make, but armor can be made for less than $75 per ton, and no Member of Congress knows the difference between bad and good armor, and yet the Government pays $450 a ton.

And may the Lord grant that our Navy never comes in conflict with a modern navy to establish this fact, because inferior, cheap armor gives no protection at all, but would greatly facilitate the sinking of our ships by its great weight; this even a layman should know.

But it can not be expected that our best experts in armor will come before Congress and give their knowledge and prove the inferiority of armor furnished for all or for certain battleships; whereby so doing they would lose hundreds of thousands of dollars themselves, because said experts would be discharged from their present position or they could do no further business with our large steel manufacturers; this even a layman should know. Therefore, Congress must offer proper compensation and protection to such men when they furnish evidence by which the Government can recover a part of the hundreds of millions of dollars of which it may have been defrauded.

It is a matter of record that the Carnegie Steel Co. has furnished inferior armor before, and said company has been convicted of defrauding the Government of $450,000 in an armor contract, and finally compromised by paying $160,000 penalty, while Mr. Herbert was Secretary of the Navy.

Thirteen years have passed since the documentary evidence shows that a Chief of Ordnance made deliberately false reports to Congress and to the Secretary of the Navy. The statute of limitations may protect the ex-Chief of Ordnance, but there is no excuse for wasting the public money on the construction of battleships that would be worse than useless in time of war.

How much bad armor has been furnished during the last 13 years can only be surmised, but it is the duty of Congress or the duty of the administration to obtain these facts, because inferior, cheap armor gives no protection, but would greatly facilitate the sinking of our ships by its great weight, which Russia learned to her cost at the battle on the Sea of Japan May 28, 1905, in which the Japanese literally destroyed the Russian Navy, sinking 22 ships and capturing 14, only 2 out of 38 escaping.

I repeat it is the duty of Congress to turn a full light on this subject by making a thorough investigation.

Workmen's Compensation.

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. FIELDS,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, March 1, 1913,

On the bill (S. 5382) to provide an exclusive remedy and compensation for accidental injuries, resulting in disability or death, to employees of common carriers by railroad engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, there is no man in this Congress or in this country who has more sympathy for the sturdy sons of toil than I, and I would be far from giving a vote here or elsewhere against any measure that I believed to be honestly to their interests or that would lead to the betterment of their conditions. I am familiar with their needs and hardships, and my heart yearns for them and for legislation that will improve their condition. And, Mr. Speaker, when I vote for a measure of that character I want it to be a measure indeed and in fact that will operate to the relief of labor. I will not vote for a measure that has only the name and not the substance sought; and for that reason I can not vote for the so-called workmen's compensation bill now under discussion, and which, if passed at this time, must be passed under suspension of the rules, which makes it impossible of amendment by this House.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that this matter is too important, and that this bill is too full of defects to be shoved through this House in this way. The proponents of this bill claim that it is correct in principle, but I contend that if passed in its present form, which it must be if passed at all at this time, it will operate unjustly and very materially to the detriment of the laborer.

Time will not permit me to discuss the bill in detail, but I desire to call the attention of this House and the country particularly to section 30 of the bill, which reads as follows:

> If either the employee or the employer shall file exceptions to the report of the adjuster as provided in this act, he may on motion in writing have the cause removed from the District Court of the United States to any State court of competent jurisdiction in the county where the cause of action arose, or where the employer resides or is doing business at the time of such removal, by filing in such State court within 30 days from the filing of said exceptions a certified copy of the report of the adjuster and his exceptions thereto, and thereupon the case shall proceed and trial shall be had in the said State court in the same manner provided in this act for trial in the District Court of the United Sstates: Provided, That if the employer remove said cause, such removal shall be to the county where the cause of action arose, or where the employer resides. If both the employee and employer shall file motions for removal, as above provided, the motion first filed shall prevail.

This section, Mr. Speaker, will overshadow every virtue contained in the bill. It will open up anew the avenues of litigation after it has already been delayed by the process of adjustment. It will finally result in the establishment of a central court in each State of this Union, where the several claimants will be forced to go for relief, or by their failure to go will be deprived of relief. Does some one ask how this can occur? Well, let us see. It provides that if either the employer or the employee should file exceptions to the report of the adjuster, he may have the cause removed from the district court of the United States to the State court of competent jurisdiction in the county where the cause of action arose or where the employer resides or is doing business. It is optional with the employer to remove the case to the court of his home county if he elects to do so. Does it give the employee the same advantage? No, it does not; and I therefore charge that it is unfair in principle and will be unjust in operation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I charged a moment ago that this measure would result in a central court in each State, where all claims against interstate carriers would have to go for trial. The bill provides that if the employer remove said cause he shall remove it to the county where the cause of action arose or where he resides or is doing business. The best lawyers in this House, even some of the advocates of this bill, admit that it is optional with the employer to remove the cause to the county where he resides or is doing business, if he elects to do so. Now, let us take a case as it first appears. After the accident occurs it goes to the adjuster. When his report is rendered the employer can immediately file exceptions to the report with his motion that the cause be removed to the county where he resides or is doing business, which, according to the judgment of able counsel here, is the county where the main office of the employer is located. This point may be two, three, four, or five hundred miles from the home of the claimant—the injured employee. He is a poor man; he is without means. He is financially unable to follow the case to the place of trial and prosecute it there, and in this deplorable condition is left to the mercy of his employer, and the ends of justice are thereby defeated. And every cause arising may be handled in the same manner.

Let us take it by States. In Maryland on one side of us and Virginia on the other practically every cause arising in these States could finally be removed to Baltimore and Richmond. In the State of Alabama practically every cause could be removed to the city of Birmingham; in Missouri they would go to St. Louis; in Nebraska they would go to Omaha; in Ohio they would go to Columbus; and in Kentucky, the State which I have the honor to represent in part, practically every case could be removed to Louisville. The Louisville & Nashville, which operates 1,635 miles of road in the State, could establish its main office in Louisville and remove every case in the State to that city. The Illinois Central and the Southern, operating several hundred miles of road, could do likewise. The Chesapeake & Ohio, which operates 543 miles in the State, could establish its main office in the city of Louisville, Lexington, Covington, or Ashland, and remove all cases to the city in which the office is established. If removed to Covington, could the claimant of Pikeville, 300 miles away, or the claimant of Ashland, Russell, and other points on the Chesapeake & Ohio system from 1 to 200 miles away, go there to litigate? In a great majority of the cases the answer is, no. Could the widow of the employee who had lost his life leave her fatherless children and go hundreds of miles to prosecute her claim? In the name of justice I answer, no.

Mr. Speaker, these are conditions that can and, in many instances, will arise, if this bill is enacted into law. I do not wish to be unfair to the employer, and I am willing to concede that some employers would not exercise the privileges extended to them through this bill; but there are many who would, and I for one am unwilling to give them an opportunity to do so, and for these reasons I shall vote, as the honest dictates of my conscience direct me, against the passage of this bill.

White Earth Indian Reservation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. GRAHAM,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1913.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, on February 27 the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] inserted in the RECORD some criticisms of the investigation of the White Earth Indian Reservation and of the report made to the House thereon by the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department. He also inserted as part of his remarks a communication from Indian Inspector James McLaughlin to the Secretary of the Interior.

A few words of explanation are in order so that no one may be misled either by the gentleman's remarks or by Mr. McLaughlin's letter.

In accordance with his uniform custom, the gentleman from South Dakota attacks the jurisdiction of the committee. Since he became a member of it he has constantly insisted that it has no jurisdiction to do anything but try to look amiable, and he breaks out when it uncovers some of the maladministration which has been prevalent in the Interior Department. If trying to prevent disclosures of such maladministration were his object as a member of the committee he would not need to change his attitude materially.

The report, he says, was made by two members of the subcommittee. Of course it was. The third member of the subcommittee joined with him in a minority report, and the other members of the committee joined with the majority of the subcommittee.

The gentleman says the report was full of conclusions not supported by the testimony. But considering his partisan attitude toward the work of the committee, would it not be more satisfactory if he had pointed them out and thus show that he had at least read the testimony?

From his point of view, however, that was probably unnecessary, as it was easier to condemn the majority's report without having read the evidence.

The particular occasion for this attack is, he says, because the report seeks to discredit Inspector James McLaughlin.

In this he is mistaken. The report seeks to discredit no one. It simply deals with the evidence in the record. It takes the facts as they appear from the evidence and summarizes them without seeking to discredit anyone or to favor anyone; nor can a partisan attack on it by the gentleman from South Dakota persuade any fair-minded person that it is a partisan report.

And now as to Inspector McLaughlin's defense of himself.

During the taking of the testimony by the subcommittee, many circumstances developed which appeared to reflect on Mr. McLaughlin. In order to be perfectly fair with him and to give him an opportunity to explain these circumstances, if he could, the subcommittee sent him the printed record of the testimony, which he admits he received, and wrote him as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, March 8, 1912.

Mr. JAMES MCLAUGHLIN,
National Hotel, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In the investigation which our committee has been making of the White Earth (Minn.) Indian Reservation, your name has frequently been mentioned during the production of the evidence, and under circumstances which may lead you to think you should appear before the committee. I send you to-day a copy of the evidence printed up to this time, and I will send you the rest of the evidence as soon as it is printed, and the committee will give you an opportunity to be heard, if you so desire.

Very truly, yours,
JAMES M. GRAHAM,
Chairman Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

The majority of the subcommittee very naturally thought if Mr. McLaughlin had any rational explanation to make as to the accusing evidence he would voluntarily come before the committee and make it. On the contrary, he informed us he did not deem it necessary to appear before the committee on his own account, adding that he stood firmly on his reports on this matter.

As these reports were in the record which was then before him, and as the testimony against him was there also, we were bound to assume he had no explanation to offer, and that we were to consider only the evidence before us, and on that theory the report was prepared. We never thought it necessary to force him to come before us to make his own defense.

He now comes forward with a very long and labored explanation which, by the way, does not explain.

Had he come before our committee he would have been sworn and his explanation would have been made under oath. He preferred, however, to wait and try to explain in an unsworn statement or letter to the Secretary under circumstances which rendered questioning or cross-examination impossible. In the absence of testimony and facts he can not now make out his case by the use of adjectives, however strong or offensive they may be. And now as to the facts:

Shortly before Inspector McLaughlin's appearance at the White Earth Reservation valuable pine-timber lands had been allotted to the Indians in 80-acre tracts under the Steenerson Act. The quantity of the pine on various parts of the land allotted differed greatly. Some tracts were literally covered with valuable pine trees; other tracts had very little pine on them. This fact opened the way for favoritism and chicane in the work of allotting. It was a thoroughly unjust and unfair way to dispose of the tribal property, even if carried out in good faith, which the evidence shows it was not. Some allotments had more than $10,000 worth of pine, and some had little or none.

There were on the reservation a number of mixed bloods, or, as I prefer to call them, "near whites," bright, shrewd fellows, skillful manipulators, who were always ready to call councils and go into them with prepared resolutions in their pockets, which they readily managed to get adopted, and the real Indians hardly realized for weeks afterwards what had been done at the council. Some of these "near whites" were the hired employees of the lumber companies which were thirsting for the valuable pine on the reservation, some of these employees receiving as high as $100 a month for merely nominal services.

Under the Steenerson Act these pine lands were allotted to the Indians in tracts of equal area, regardless of value, by the Indian agent, Michelet. In making the allotments certain favored mixed bloods and "near whites," who were friendly to the interests of these hungry and thirsty lumber companies, managed to get the best allotments.

Rev. Charles Wright, head chief of the Mississippi Chippewas, complained to the authorities at Washington about the way the alloting was done, and as a result of his complaint Special Indian Agent Downs was sent to investigate the matter.

Mr. Downs reported that the allotting was partial and unfair, and on the strength of his report the allotments were set aside.

The mixed-blood and "near-white" employees of the lumber companies thereupon became active, with the result that Inspector McLaughlin was dispatched to White Earth. He was not sent to investigate the fraudulent allotment; he was simply to ascertain the wishes of a majority of the Indians on the subject. Former Commissioner Leupp testified that McLaughlin was selected for this mission on account of his well-known ability for handling Indians. He went to White Earth, called a council, and made a report recommending the reinstatement of the fraudulent allotments, and on his recommendation the Downs report was overruled and the partial and unfair allotments reinstated.

In his report Mr. McLaughlin makes a vicious and, I believe, an unwarranted attack on the Rev. Mr. Wright, and probably thus succeeded in discrediting him at the White House, as President Roosevelt afterwards refused to see him, although he presented letters of introduction from the governor of Minnesota and from the senior United States Senator from that State.

A fairly careful reading of Inspector McLaughlin's letter to the Secretary of the Interior shows that it conforms to the statements made in this committee's report in all material matters and that it admits practically everything charged against him in the report. He admits his instructions were to obtain the views of a majority of the Indians as to the allotment matter. For this purpose he was not only to call a council, but to resort to any method he saw fit, or, to quote the language of his instructions:

> And you are instructed to adopt any other measures you may deem necessary to ascertain the views and wishes of the majority of the adult Indians in the premises.

These instructions are very plain. He was not directed to get the views of a majority of those attending a council. The emphatic point was to get the views and wishes of a majority of the adult Indians, and he is given full power and authority to do whatever is necessary and incur whatever expense is necessary to ascertain the views and wishes of such majority. Did he do this? He does not deny the truth of the committee's finding that there were 2,800 Indians on the reservation entitled to allotments and that about 1,200 of these were male adults. He admits he found only 130 male adult Indians in favor of the allotments made by Agent Michelet. How does he figure 130 to be a majority of 2,800, or even of 1,200? His reasons for recommending the reinstatement of the Michelet allotments, which the overwhelming evidence in the record shows to be fraudulent, are less than flimsy. He says as councils go the one he called was "a greater representation than usual." But it was not a greater representation than usual; it was a majority of the adult Indians he was to consult and ascertain the views of, and he did not do it. On the contrary, he overrode the facts, he overrode Inspector Downs's report, and recommended the reinstatement of the fraudulent allotments after ascertaining the views of only a very small minority of the adult Indians, and that small minority was made up, in part, of the mixed bloods and "near whites" on the pay rolls of the lumber companies.

It is difficult to see why Mr. McLaughlin calls attention to the Mille Lac matter. He admits his part in that raid of $40,000 on the Treasury. He makes even stronger the statement in our report that the "improvements" for which the $40,000 was to be paid had no existence in fact by quoting from Judge Howry's opinion that these improvements were practically of no value and were assessed at what they had been.

Mr. McLaughlin, aided by Agent Michelet, did the assessing. What did they assess? Property practically of no value. Oh, but this $40,000 was an inducement to the Indians to move from Mille Lac to White Earth.

As a matter of fact, most of them had moved before this "appraisement" was made. But if it was a gift for the benefit of the Indians it should have gone to the Indians. Our report shows where it did go, as follows. I quote from the report:

> Three months after the act passed Congress we find Michelet and McLaughlin had completed their appraisement (so called), and held an alleged council with the Mille Lac Indians, and from them had procured an agreement that the money should be divided as follows:
> 1. Gus H. Beaulieu should receive $4,000.
> 2. Daniel B. Henderson should receive $3,650.
> 3. Sam Powell should receive $500.
> 4. Charles A. Ruffee should receive $150.
> 5. D. H. Robbins should receive $180.
> 6. The "chiefs" should receive $2,000.
> 7. The Indians should receive $18,500, prorated among them.
> 8. The sum of $11,020 should be deposited in a bank to the credit of the Indians.
> When the Indians learned what was going on they commenced suit against Beaulieu to recover the $11,020 which he had deposited to his personal credit and checked on as his own money. Beaulieu compromised by giving their attorneys $1,000 of the funds and leaving $6,000 in the bank for the Indians, thereby increasing his personal share of the plunder by $3,420. Out of this $6,600 an attorney received a $500 fee and the remainder was prorated among the Indians.

I do not say Mr. McLaughlin knew where it would go when he made this appraisement of $40,000 as a gift to the Indians. I do say his long experience in Indian affairs should have enabled him to make a shrewd guess as to where it would probably go.

I am at a loss to understand why he refers to a statement made to the committee by Judge Burch about wild rice and honey. That statement was not testimony and was not received or treated as testimony, although Mr. McLaughlin tries to give that impression. There is no reference to it in the committee's report, and the use made of it shows either a want of comprehension or a deliberate attempt to deceive.

On October 6, 1905, Mr. McLaughlin made his report, indorsing the Michelet allotting, and on the next day he forwarded a supplemental report concerning the sale of timber on allotted lands. Was this second or supplemental report merely for the purpose of causing a diversion in order to keep the attention of the department from being focussed on the dissatisfaction of the Indians over the Michelet allotment? He had no instructions to deal with anything but the allotments, but he took occasion to report against the Wisconsin lumbermen and in favor of the local Minnesota lumber companies by telling how well satisfied the Indians were with the treatment received from the Minnesota concerns. And yet the record shows that at the sale of timber to which he refers, held on November 15, 1905, these Minnesota companies made fraudulent and fake bids, offering enormous prices for hardwood which they did not want and of which there was little, and low prices for pine which they did want and of which there was much. The record shows that the bid of Mr. Herrick, of Wisconsin, was from $600,000 to $1,000,000 better than the bids of the Nichols-Chisam Co. or the Lyman-Irwin Co., two of the concerns which Mr. McLaughlin says had been giving the Indians such satisfaction. His attitude would not need to be changed if he held a brief for the Minnesota concerns.

Looking back over the ground it now seems clear that if Mr. McLaughlin had never visited White Earth, and, the Downs report had been allowed to stand, the Indians on that reservation would have been saved much subsequent suffering and great loss.

He refers for corroboration and support to the minutes of the meeting or council he called at White Earth, but as these minutes were prepared by him or under his direction they are not very valuable as corroboration. When I consider Mr. McLaughlin's two reports from White Earth printed at pages 568 and 575 of the record of the testimony, and consider in connection therewith the testimony of the Rev. Mr. Wright and the Rev. Mr. Potter, and also his letter to the Secretary of the Interior, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which letter is in the nature of a confession, and when I consider in connection with these what has transpired on the reservation as the result of his action, I feel that the report of the committee treated him altogether too gently.

Two Years in Congress—The Work of This Congress.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER W. MOTT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 4, 1913.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, when this Congress began its work we heard much from our political opponents of what they were going to do in the way of economy and reform, but now that they have gotten through they will not be bold enough to claim that they have accomplished anything in that direction. One of their campaign assertions was the alleged extravagance of the Sixty-first Congress, but the appropriations made by this Congress will exceed those of any of its predecessors, and if all the bills passed by the House had become laws the aggregate would have been much greater. We have had a large number of Democratic investigations and a great deal of money has been expended in that way without any good result. The monetary question, which is in great need of action by Congress, has been absolutely neglected, but committees have been seeking to make political capital by investigations into various lines of business, without any good result whatever. In the District of Columbia the Government is paying $600,000 a year rent, but bills to provide the Government with necessary buildings have met with great opposition. A pension bill, however, was promptly passed, and the expenditures for that purpose ran up to an enormous sum, probably because it was thought it would help the party get votes.

Soon the question of the tariff will be taken up. It has already been greatly agitated and much time and money wasted in that way, without any result except harm to the country. The statistics of our foreign commerce, showing an enormous increase in imports under the new tariff of 1909, make it clear that there is no great need of tariff reduction, but from our experience with the bills passed in this Congress it is evident that whatever is done in that direction will be to the injury of the business of the country.

LIGHT ON TARIFF MISREPRESENTATION.

In the year 1912, 54.58 per cent of all imports came in free of duty. In December 58.42 per cent came in free. In 1871 the highest percentage of free imports for any month of that year was 9 per cent, and it was only 1 per cent in January of that year. But last December over 58 per cent of the imports were free. That shows how the tariff has been reduced, though the free traders give the party that has made that reduction no credit. They take the average ad valorem rate of duty on the dutiable imports alone as the basis of their criticism, without making any allowance for the free list. The average ad valorem rate of duty on articles entered for consumption in 1890 was 29.59 per cent; in 1908, 23.88 per cent; and in 1912, 18.58 per cent, showing a very considerable reduction made under the existing tariff. The imports per capita in 1890 averaged $12.16; in 1908, $13.11; in 1912, $16.94, thus showing a large increase in imports with the lower rates of duty under the existing tariff.

The Democratic Tariff Handbook, in use by the Ways and Means Committee, gives the wealth of the country in 1912 as $175,000,000,000 and in 1909 as $150,000,000,000, making an increase of $25,000,000,000 in the wealth of this country in three years under the existing tariff. It places the wealth of the country in 1900 at $88,500,000,000, showing an increase in 12 years of $65,500,000,000. Nothing like that was ever before accomplished in the history of the world by any country, and would not have been accomplished here except for the protective tariff. The per capita wealth of the country in 1900 was $1,164 and in 1912, $1,801, an increase of $637 in that comparatively short time in the wealth of the country for every man, woman, and child within its limits. That does not look as though there was anything wrong with the country, so far as the tariff is concerned, and certainly there is nothing wrong that we can expect any remedy for from our free-trade opponents. According to this tariff handbook the estimated production of the country on January 1, 1912, for the year was $22,014,000,000, and with this remarkable showing they propose to begin their experimenting in the way and manner they followed when last they were in power; and we all know what followed then, when, according to Mr. Gompers, the labor leader, some 3,000,000 persons were thrown out of employment, and soup houses had to be provided to keep them from starvation.

WHAT THE COUNTRY MAY EXPECT.

In this handbook is given the average ad valorem duties for 1912 on the various articles dealt with by the bills passed by this House and the average amount of reduction proposed under the Democratic policy. For instance, the average rate of duty on the articles contained in the free-list bill was 18.46. That is the bill that puts agricultural implements, boots and shoes, and various other things on the free list. In the wool bill the average duty on raw wool is stated to be 43.61 per cent, and that, according to the Democratic statement, was to be reduced to 29 per cent, and on wool manufactures from 82.98 to 48.36 per cent. The difference between the duty on raw wool and manufactured goods under the existing law is an average of 39.37 per cent. The difference under the Democratic law, according to their own figures, will be 19.36 per cent, wholly insufficient to protect American workmen. On cotton goods the reduction is to be from an average of 45.51 to 27.06, and on metals from 34.35 to 22.42, and on chemicals from 25.91 to 16.66, while sugar, on which the average duty is given as 48.18, is to go on the free list. Other schedules, which were not dealt with by the present Congress, will meet with similar average reductions.

To make up for this enormous loss of revenue we are to have an income tax. The alleged tariff rates which our Democratic friends have given are not necessarily correct, but they afford an idea of what is in store for us. As many producers have testified before the Ways and Means Committee, the reduction can only be accomplished by reducing the wages of labor. How much higher wages are in this country than abroad is not a matter of dispute. In many lines imports are now large, for the simple reason that workmen will not accept in this country, and are not asked to accept, the low wages paid in Europe and elsewhere. But with the reduced rates of tariff they will either have to accept such wages or else go without work. The Japanese and Chinese are rapidly developing manufacturing industries, and with their low rates of wages our workmen can not hope to compete. It is a sorry outlook, and we can only live and hope for the best.

OUR DECAYING SHIPPING IN THE FOREIGN TRADE.

It is unfortunate that the first Democratic House in 16 years ends its work without doing anything to promote our shipping in the foreign trade. In 1828 we were carrying in American vessels 87 per cent of our foreign commerce, whereas to-day we are carrying only about 8 per cent. We had 757,998 tons of shipping in that trade in 1828, which had increased in 1855 to 2,535,200 tons. But in 1911 we had only 872,071 tons engaged in the foreign trade, although the wealth of the country had increased sixteen times since 1855. In that year we built 583,450 tons of shipping, whereas in 1911 we built only 291,162 tons. The foreign commerce of the country in 1850 aggregated in value only $317,000,000, whereas in 1912 it was $4,217,000,000. With this enormous increase in our commerce, our shipping in the foreign trade has declined nearly two-thirds. While other nations have greatly increased their shipping and vastly increased their participation in our trade, we have gone in the opposite direction because we have not protected our shipping.

That is clear from the record of our coastwise trade. No further back than 1855 we had 2,895,371 tons of shipping in the coastwise trade, which had increased in 1911 to 6,720,313 tons. This rapid growth of our coastwise trade, exceeding that of any other nation on earth, is altogether due to the fact that it is absolutely protected. No foreign vessel is allowed to engage in that trade. It has not only increased enormously, but the transportation rates have greatly declined, showing the benefit of home competition. In the foreign trade our vessels are subject to the competition of all other countries, and, as the wages paid are so much greater in this country than abroad, it costs more to construct vessels and more to operate them, particularly as our laws provide that American seamen shall be granted in food and other things rights and privileges not accorded to those engaged in similar work on foreign ships.

LASCARS AND COOLIES ON FOREIGN SHIPS.

A large percentage of the seamen on British ships are Lascars, a class that live principally on rice and dress in the scantiest fashion possible. American workmen can not compete with such labor without protection. Vessels on the Pacific are largely manned by coolies, both Chinese, Japanese, and Hindus. Such labor is not allowed on American vessels, and that is one reason why our shipping in the foreign trade does not increase. Our tonnage in the foreign trade is really less than the record shows. Vessels in the trade between our Atlantic and Pacific coast ports, by way of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, are by law required to be registered, although cargoes on this route can be carried only by American ships. If these were subtracted, including vessels that have outlived their usefulness but still retain their register, and the tonnage on the Yukon River deducted, the remainder would comprise little outside the steamers under the ocean mail act of 1891 and a few steamers on the Pacific under the American flag.

Even when our naval vessels made their famed trip around the world they had to be accompanied by colliers sailing under foreign flags. In case of war we could not have obtained foreign vessels to use as colliers, and, not having vessels of our own, our fleet would be obliged to stay at home or within a short distance of the American coast, so as to be able to obtain coal. Laws to build up the shipping of the country were among the first passed by the United States Congress. In the early days we were doing the carrying trade for foreign nations. In 1796 we carried not only 92 per cent of our foreign commerce, but we did a great deal in that line for other nations. Now we do none at all for foreign countries and carry only about 7 per cent of our own commerce.

THE PANAMA CANAL TOLL QUESTION.

We are expending between four and five hundred million dollars for the construction of the Panama Canal, but when it is completed we will have comparatively few vessels to make use of it. It will be greatly to the advantage of foreign nations, and yet when we propose to allow our coastwise vessels to use the canal free Great Britain opposes that course, for fear that it will give some advantage to our shipping. Russia, Austria-Hungary, and Sweden refund their vessels' canal tolls paid in the Suez Canal, while Germany, France, Holland, Japan, Italy, and Spain indirectly, through subsidies to national mail lines using the canal, refund tolls to their vessels. The British Peninsular & Oriental Line subsidy chances to be almost exactly the same as its Suez Canal tolls. But when we propose to allow our vessels engaged in a trade from which foreign vessels are excluded to use our own Panama Canal free of tolls Great Britain objects.

Great Britain built up her shipping by subsidies. The American Collins Line was driven from the ocean before the war by British subsidized lines, and even to this day Great Britain is paying an enormous subsidy to the Cunard Line, and other foreign nations are helping their shipping by subsidies; and in the case of Germany, by discriminating rates on the railroads and in other ways. The only vessels we have on the Atlantic in the foreign trade are enabled to maintain themselves by the postal subsidy act of 1891. But that aid has been insufficient to extend our commerce or enable new vessels to be built. A British shipowner needs to pay only one-tenth part of the cost of a vessel, as the banks there will take notes secured by mortgage on the vessels. But our banks will not do that kind of business, and a vessel has to be practically paid for in cash.

LABOR COST AT HOME AND ABROAD.

The labor cost of a vessel in this country is at least 50 per cent more than in Great Britain because of the higher wages paid. The standardization of vessels in England enables them to be built at a very much less cost. A large shipyard will be building several vessels of the same kind at one time, whereas in this country instead of building two vessels of the same kind a shipyard will be building large and small vessels of various kinds at once, necessarily making their cost a great deal more. The cost of labor in American shipyards is from two to four times the cost of similar labor in Europe. We can not have ships in the foreign trade unless we do something to make up for this difference in pay and in cost of operating vessels. It is unfortunate that the only thing done in this Congress under the pretense of helping shipping was something that really hurts it, and that was the passage of a law which admits free to American register foreign vessels to be employed in our foreign trade. So far, that has amounted to nothing, because the difficulty with us is not alone in the cost of the vessel but in the cost of operating it after it is built.

Another provision passed by this Congress allows the free importation of everything used in the construction and equipment of a vessel. For many years we have had a law allowing the free importation of raw materials for the construction of vessels in the foreign trade. But the admission free of all kinds of materials for the construction and equipment of vessels for the coastwise trade is simply a blow at American workmen, without a benefit of any kind to anyone in this country. As foreign ships are not allowed to engage in the coastwise trade, there was no need of allowing plates, anchors, and material of all kinds for the use of such vessels to be imported free. It only takes work from American mechanics for the benefit of the foreigner. But that is the sole thing done by this Congress, with the pretense of helping American shipping. We will soon have the Panama Canal open, with practically no vessels to make use of it. The situation is a good deal as described by a Democratic Representative from New York, who said that it reminded him of department stores competing in the same city, and one of the stores using the wagons of a rival for the delivery of its goods. We are using the ships of our foreign rivals to deliver our goods. They are in combines and trusts and fix rates to suit themselves. Our shipping to South America is entirely at the mercy of the foreign shipping trust. If we had our own vessels, we would not only greatly increase our trade, but in case of war we would have the vessels absolutely necessary for aids to our Navy, not only for coaling but for many other purposes.

MISTAKEN ATTACK ON THE NAVY.

We are making the same mistake in regard to our Navy. The Democratic Party in this House opposed the construction of two new battleships, although the deterioration in the existing vessels would not be made up by the construction of two new ones. Nothing could be more fatal to our country in case of foreign trouble than this shortsighted policy of refusing to construct ample naval vessels. One thousand men with a battleship are equivalent to an army corps of 50,000 men, and yet the party in control of this House proposes to deprive us of that necessary force to protect our coasts, while other countries are rapidly increasing the number of their Dreadnoughts.

Germany hoisted her flag in Venezuela at one time, and retired because, as a result of the Spanish War, we were ready for her with a stronger navy. Germany is now building four Dread- noughts a year, while we started only one last year. Germany may hoist her flag in Central America again, and she would have a navy twice as strong as ours. The War with Spain over Cuba would never have taken place if we had had a navy of sufficient strength to assure our success. That war cost about $500,000,000, and pensions and all in 100 years will probably amount to three times that sum. A powerful navy, at a comparatively small cost, will insure peace, the permanency of the Monroe doctrine, and the peaceful development of the continent. We are now the fourth naval power, whereas we were the second a few years ago. England, Germany, and France are ahead of us, and in a few years more we will be behind both Japan and Italy. We would be at the mercy of a great naval power, as Russia was to Japan. We have not, on an average, one destroyer for a battleship, whereas we should have four. It is idle to talk about the world respecting any nation which has not ample means of defense. Italy has just seized Tripoli from Turkey, because that country was not able to defend herself. Austria-Hungary seized Bosnia and Herzegovina in the same way. Russia has seized one part of Persia and Great Britain practically another part, and they drove off an American who was helping that country to maintain its own army. For many years Germany and France discriminated against us in tariff matters. When we provided a law for retaliation they both desisted, although Germany still discriminates against us to a considerable extent. It takes three years to build a battleship, so that in case of trouble they can not be provided nor can they be purchased of a foreign country.

INCREASING EFFICIENCY OF SHIPS.

The guns on six of our battleships now are of low velocity and short range. These vessels could be annihilated by the new vessels of a foreign navy, which could keep out of their range. The guns in use to-day on battleships are double the efficiency of 15 years ago. The new battleship Pennsylvania will carry 12 guns. The Oregon, in the time of the Spanish War, carried four. A vessel now will carry three times as many guns, with double the efficiency, making six times the efficiency of a vessel at the time of the Spanish-American War. At that time they could load and fire a 13-inch gun once in five minutes. Now they will do it three times in one minute. Then the speed of the ships is 5 knots greater and the range of the guns are from 8 to 10 miles, as compared with 3 to 5 miles of those on the Oregon. This shows the great need of our keeping up with other nations if we are to be in a position to defend our rights, and that is the only certain way to maintain peace.

A navy decides a war in these times. The Japanese fleet decided the war with Russia. The Italian Navy defeated Turkey, and if it were not for the Greek Navy Turkey would be in a much better position to-day in its war with the Balkan allies. No greater mistake could be made than that of refusing properly to develop the Navy. Vast millions have been voted in this House for public buildings and river and harbor improvements, many of which, of course, are necessary, but none of which are so important to the Nation as an efficient Navy, and yet for that purpose wholly inadequate provision has been made.

OF

HON. A. W. LAFFERTY,

OF OREGON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 4, 1913,

On the bill (S. 7723) to regulate the hours of employment and safeguard the health of females employed in the District of Columbia in any mill, factory, manufacturing or mechanical establishment, or workshop, laundry, bakery, printing, clothing, dressmaking or millinery establishment, mercantile establishment, store, hotel, restaurant, office, or where any goods are sold or distributed, or by any express or transportation company, or in the transmission or distribution of telegraph or telephone messages or merchandise.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, this morning at 4 a. m. and again at 9.30 a. m. I did everything within my power to procure the passage through this House of S. 7723, a bill to regulate the hours of employment and safeguard the health of females employed in the District of Columbia in any mill, factory, manufacturing or mechanical establishment, or workshop, laundry, bakery, printing, clothing, dressmaking or millinery establishment, mercantile establishment, store, hotel, restaurant, office, or where any goods are sold or distributed, or by any express or transportation company, or in the transmission or distribution of telegraph or telephone messages or merchandise.

This bill, in substance, was first introduced in this House by myself on June 17, 1912, and is numbered H. R. 25395. December 12 thereafter the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] introduced a similar measure in the Senate, and December 14, two days later, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS] introduced a similar measure in this House.

The La Follette measure passed the Senate a few days ago, and on March 1 came to the House and was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

My efforts to pass the Senate bill through the House this morning will appear from a verbatim report of the proceedings had in the House, as follows:

HOURS OF EMPLOYMENT OF FEMALES IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on the District of Columbia from the further consideration of the bill (S. 7723), to suspend the rules, and pass the bill.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask if the bill is here. We can not act upon it unless it is here.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not here.

Mr. MANN. We have to have the Senate engrossed copy of the bill before we can act on it.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois lies, and I would like to be heard for a moment. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to suspend the rules and pass this bill, and under the rules the Speaker of the House was required to refer the bill to the District of Columbia Committee, because it makes a charge upon the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. That is the trouble about it.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Under the rules the bill could not be here, but it is in order to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill. This matter was all taken up this morning with the parliamentarian of the House and gone over thoroughly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman could move to suspend the rules if we had an engrossed copy of the bill here.

Mr. LAFFERTY. You can suspend the rules and pass a bill written on a sheet of foolscap.

Mr. MANN. But you can not pass in the House a Senate bill written on a sheet of foolscap.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senate bill has now come to the House and is in the possession of a committee of the House.

Mr. MANN. I would like to know how you get the bill back here.

Mr. LENROOT. By discharging the committee that has jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. But the bill has to be produced.

Mr. LENROOT. Constructively the bill will be on the Speaker's table or in possession of the House.

The SPEAKER. But actually it is not.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that if this bill has been referred from the Speaker's desk to the Committee on the District of Columbia it is in the possession of the House to such an extent that a motion to suspend the rules and discharge the committee is in order; for otherwise, Mr. Speaker, it would never be possible to discharge a committee, because the bill physically is properly in the possession of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and the physical possession of the bill on the Speaker's desk would give no more jurisdiction than if it were not there at all.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman seems to think that you can read some other paper up there. The very motion of the gentleman requires a Senate bill to be read from the Clerk's desk; and there is only one copy, and that is the engrossed copy of the Senate bill—a certified copy. There never has been a case since I have been a Member of the House when any bill was permitted to be passed where the original papers were not there. Any paper is original House bill paper, of course.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] whether the possession of a paper, if it is not properly in the possession of the Clerk, is any possession at all?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] what we are going to pass.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Where is it?

Mr. LENROOT. It is in the possession of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. How can the House know what is in the Senate bill unless it is read?

Mr. MANN. It has to be read as part of the motion.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I would suggest, if that be true, the House could not go to the extent of entertaining the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not know but that the engrossed copy of the bill was here until the fact was ascertained.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to suggest to the Chair it could not be properly here under any circumstances except upon a report of the committee.

Mr. MANN. If anybody had possession of it, it would be here.

The SPEAKER. Yesterday it turned out that the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. HAMLIN, got a bill passed here that the Chair himself introduced—his own bill—and it was passed, and then the House started in on another one that the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BARTHOLDT, introduced, and the fact developed that we did not have an engrossed copy of either one of them here. So the matter was vacated, and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. HAMLIN, sent upstairs to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and got the engrossed copies of both bills, and they were passed. The House ought to know what is in a bill.

Mr. LENROOT. If I may make just one more statement——

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. With reference to this particular bill, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia was requested to return the bill to the Clerk's desk and refused to do so.

The SPEAKER. He had a perfect right to do that.

Mr. LENROOT. He certainly did; but if that be the proper procedure the chairman of any committee can defeat the will of the House with reference to a suspension of the rules in discharging a committee, and that is a very common practice——

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair ask the gentleman a question. Does not the gentleman think it would be very dangerous practice to pass a bill if the House did not know what was in it?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what this request amounts to.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I would like to be heard for just a second.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for just a minute, until I can ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] a question? What does this bill contain?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It is the woman's 8-hour bill for the District of Columbia. It provides an 8-hour workday for certain classes of female employees in the District.

Mr. DYER. When did it go to the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Two or three days ago.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, the records of this House show, and the records in the immediate possession of the Speaker also show, that that bill, Senate bill 7723, an act to regulate the hours of employment and safeguard the health of females employed in the District of Columbia, passed the Senate and came to the House and was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Now, if the Chair is going to hold that the motion to discharge the committee and pass the bill is out of order because the bill is not physically present in engrossed copy, I will ask to be recognized to move simply that the committee be discharged from further consideration of the bill, which will authorize us to send over and get the bill from the chairman of the committee. And in that connection I desire to read the following request:

"Hon. BEN JOHNSON,
"Chairman Committee on District of Columbia.

"DEAR SIR: We desire to move to suspend the rules and pass S. 7723. Judge Crisp says it will be necessary to have the engrossed copy on the Speaker's table."

Mr. MANN. The gentleman just said he did not.

Mr. LAFFERTY. That was after this came back. I read further:

"If you will please send same over to Judge Crisp at once by this page, we will greatly appreciate it.

"A. W. LAFFERTY.
"HENRY ALLEN COOPER.
"C. R. DAVIS.
"WILLIAM KENT."

That is indorsed on the back as follows:

"The bill has been referred to the District Committee. The committee alone can report it to the House. The committee must act upon it.

"Respectfully, BEN JOHNSON."

But the printed copies of the Senate bill in the document room, the copy which the gentleman has sent down to the Speaker's desk, should be recognized and read as the Senate bill upon a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill. There could not be any question about the authenticity of the copies.

The SPEAKER. Why should there not be?

Mr. LAFFERTY. It is a Government document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not contend that all Government documents are authentic, does he?

Mr. LAFFERTY. I will read from this document. It is indorsed as follows:

"Sixty-second Congress, third session. S. 7723. In the House of Representatives. March 1, 1913. Referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia."

It is indorsed at the end as follows:

"Passed the Senate February 27, 1913.
"Attest:
"CHARLES G. BENNETT, Secretary."

The SPEAKER. That is the printed copy?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Yes; that is the printed copy, presented by a Member of the House of Representatives as being furnished to the Members by the Public Printer through the document room. It ought to be treated as official for the purpose of passing a bill under suspension of the rules. The necessity of a thing should give rise to the rule. Necessity is the mother of law as well as the mother of invention.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Necessity does not know any law. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I believe the Speaker recognized me on a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did recognize the gentleman on a point of order.

Mr. MANN. The last remark of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] illustrates his point of view. What are the rules for, except to let us do what we want to do—what he wants to do? [Laughter.] Necessity is the mother of invention. Force is the only power that controls. [Laughter.]

But the gentleman, upon reflection, will see that the House can not proceed upon that basis. Every once in awhile an engrossed copy of a bill, passing from the Senate to the House or passing from the House to the Senate, is lost in some way, and invariably, in every legislative body, it has been held that where an engrossed copy of a bill passed in one branch of the legislative body had become lost, you must obtain from that branch another copy of the engrossed bill before you can proceed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understand the Senate has taken a recess until 9.30 this morning.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand the legislative condition to be that there are two bills that have not been agreed to—the Indian appropriation bill, which is in the Senate, and the general deficiency bill, which is out, but the papers are in the possession of the Senate, and the report will have to be made to the Senate before we can act upon it. The Senate has adjourned until 9.30 this morning. Therefore it can not be acted upon until 9.30 this morning. I will therefore move that the House take a recess as soon as the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] makes a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent——

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Does not a point of order take precedence over this request?

The SPEAKER. The motion to make requests was taken by special order the other day.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has not the floor. He is sitting down. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Only privileged matters are taken up.

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged matter.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now take a recess until 9.30 this morning.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes a. m.) the House stood in recess until 9.30 o'clock a. m., March 4, 1913.

HOURS OF EMPLOYMENT OF FEMALES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee on the District of Columbia from the further consideration of the bill S. 7723, "An act to regulate the hours of employment and safeguard the health of females employed in the District of Columbia," and pass the bill.

Now, that is the same matter that was up this morning, and the parliamentary situation is that the Senate bill has been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and the chairman of that committee, after a written request submitted yesterday by myself and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], and the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT], refused in writing to send that bill over here to the Speaker's table, so that the engrossed copy might be present when the motion to discharge the committee and pass the bill could be presented. Under the rules or precedents the House can not suspend the rules and pass the bill unless the engrossed copy is present on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] rise?

Mr. HAMLIN. I demand a second, in order to find out what the bill is.

The SPEAKER. Demand a second on what?

Mr. HAMLIN. On the motion of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. He is not through stating the matter.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Now, Mr. Speaker, this same question came before the House on February 28, 1907, as follows:

"Mr. WILLIAM E. HUMPHREY of Washington moved to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries from further consideration of the bill (S. 1462) for the establishment of fish-cultural stations on Puget Sound, and pass the same."

The motion was made without an engrossed copy of the bill. The Speaker replied:

"It is in order to make a motion to discharge the committee from further consideration of the bill, and the motion which has been made is in order."

The SPEAKER. That is not the motion the gentleman made this morning.

Mr. LAFFERTY. The motion I made this morning is not necessarily the motion I present now, but if the Chair rules now it is not in order to suspend the rules and pass the bill without the engrossed copy, I desire to amend by a motion simply to confine it to the first half and to suspend the rules and discharge the committee, and then, in supplementing that, I will ask that the following order be adopted:

"Ordered, That the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia deliver forthwith to the House the engrossed copy of the bill S. 7723."

In support of that I will say that the Speaker on the former occasion said:

"Debate has been in order, but at the close of the debate, after the bill has been searched for on the files of the committee and does not materialize, the vote can not be taken; the House can not act upon a bill of which it does not have manual possession."

The order proposed by Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington was then agreed to.

The order was as follows:

"Ordered, That the Clerk be directed to request the Senate to send to the House a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 1462) to establish one or more fish-cultural stations on Puget Sound, State of Washington, the original having been lost."

Now, then suppose every Member upon this floor was desirous and anxious to pass this 8-hour bill, but the chairman of the committee, over in the House Office Building, was barricaded behind his doors, refusing to deliver the engrossed copy to the House, which in effect is what he is doing. Under the precedent which I have read it is in order for the Speaker to entertain a motion to suspend the rules, to discharge the committee, and pass the bill. But under that precedent the Speaker can not put the question upon final passage until the engrossed copy is brought over.

The SPEAKER. He can not put it at any stage of the game, because it is absolutely necessary to have that engrossed copy here, and any other rule would work almost anarchy.

Mr. LAFFERTY. But it is not necessary that the engrossed copy be present or the fact even be ascertained that it is present prior to entertaining the motion to discharge the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair never said it was. The Chair rules on matters as they are presented here, and sometimes he goes out of his way to make a suggestion to gentlemen how to get in.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I amend my motion and simply move to discharge the committee from further consideration of the bill (S. 7723) to regulate the hours of employment and safeguard the health of females in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. I demand a second to ascertain what the motion is, or else reserve a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee on the District of Columbia from further consideration of the 8-hour bill. Is a second demanded?

Mr. LAFFERTY. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] desire time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; I do not care anything about it.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the motion that the rules be suspended and the Committee on the District of Columbia be discharged from the further consideration of that bill prevail?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask immediate consideration of the order which I send to the Clerk's desk.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now take a recess until 10.30.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the immediate consideration of this order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the House take a recess until 10.30.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 7 minutes a. m.) the House stood in recess until 10.30 a. m.

There was no opportunity between the recess last mentioned and the final adjournment at 12 o'clock to renew my efforts to pass the Senate bill, owing to the fact that the veto message of the President on the sundry civil bill and other privileged matters consumed all of the time of the House up to the minute of adjournment. Therefore the Sixty-second Congress stands adjourned without day without any 8-hour law for female employees in the District of Columbia.

I have no doubt that during the Sixty-third Congress the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] will again procure the passage of his bill through the Senate and that we who favor the same will be able to procure its passage through the House and that it will become a law. Such a law has already been enacted in the States of California, Colorado, and Washington. Such ought to be the law in every State in the Union.

If I had my say about it there would be an 8-hour law for men, women, and children in every State in the Union and in the District of Columbia. But the securing of such a law for females is a step in the right direction, and I am proud of the fact that I had the honor to introduce the first bill in the National House of Representatives for that purpose. On the same date I introduced a separate bill providing for an 8-hour day for male employees, and I hope to secure its enactment into law within a few years at the latest. I should be glad to vote for its passage to-morrow.

The La Follette bill, which I endeavored to procure to be passed through the House this morning, would affect 52,488 women who work for wages in the District of Columbia, according to the census report of 1910. Many of these women work 10 hours a day and some of them longer.

Speaking of the operations of the California law, which is in many ways similar to the bill under consideration, Miss Maud Younger, of San Francisco, recently made the following statement before the House Committee on Labor:

The 8-hour law for women took effect in California on the 21st of May, 1911. Since then 20 months have elapsed, and upon the ground of actual experience we can now say with Mark Twain that the objections to this measure are all in the nature of prophecies which have never come true when tried, for many objections were raised and dire disaster was prophesied should the 8-hour bill become law.

First, there was the objection to giving the women 1 day's rest in 7. This objection came from those enterprises which were in operation every day in the year, as telegraph, telephone, and transportation companies, and hotels which said, "Our guests eat 7 days in the week," and condensed-milk factories which cried, "Cows give milk on Sunday as well as week days." But since the law has gone into effect all these enterprises have been able to adjust themselves by the simple method of employing 1 extra relief girl to every 6 previously employed; that is, she relieves A on Monday, B on Tuesday, C on Wednesday, and so on. Consequently it is merely a question of expense due to the employment of additional women.

Then there were other employers who did not object to the 6-day week but to the 8-hour day. First came the retail merchants. They said their stores were open from 8 in the morning until 6 at night, or 10 hours a day. However, since the passage of the bill they have been able to adjust themselves to the law by having part of their force work from 8 in the morning until 5 in the afternoon and part from 9 until 6, with 1 hour for lunch.

The laundries also objected to the 8-hour day, though not to the 48-hour week. They said that on Monday morning the drivers collect the wash, so that the girls did not come until noon, which necessitated longer hours on other days. Since the law has gone into effect, however, they have been able to adjust themselves by having the girls come on Mondays at noon and work until 9 at night, with 1 hour for supper. The San Francisco laundries incidentally already had a 48-hour week, owing to the union; but the workers said it had cost them 11 weeks' strike and $60,000. They thought that an 8-hour day through legislation would be simpler and more economical, also far less inconvenient to the public in general.

Then it was objected to that there was no provision for overtime or rush seasons. On this subject a little cracker packer spoke at the public hearing in our State senate.

She told of her work, 9 hours a day, standing at the end of a canvas chute, down which the crackers came so fast that she had to pack, pack, without turning her head—pack without moving aside unless some one were there to replace her or the crackers would go all over the floor. Then sometimes, after the day's work was over and there were rush orders, she must work overtime, 2 or 3 hours, perhaps. She said that though the girls were paid for overtime they would rather give up the extra pay than to have the wear and strain that resulted from the extra work. She said that the day after they were so tired that even shorter hours could not make up for the strain under which they filled the rush orders. A short time after the law went into effect I met this same girl on the street and asked how the law was working. She said the girls practically did as much in the 8 hours as they had previously done in 9, because they were so much fresher when they went to work in the morning. She said also that there was no difficulty in filling the rush orders.

Then, it was objected that there was no provision for special seasons. Here came the department stores again, with their Christmas season, when they remain open at night. However, they have been able to adjust themselves to this law by having part of their force come at noon or at 1 and remain until 10 in the evening, with 1 or 2 hours for supper. The owner of one department store told me that though this involved an additional expense that the 8-hour law had proved very satisfactory, owing to the greater efficiency of the girls. He said that previously, under the long hours, the girls had broken down and it had been necessary to replace them and to train new girls during the terrible holiday rush, but that under the 8-hour law every girl had remained at her post throughout the entire season, and the law had thus been of benefit to the merchants themselves. In a letter which Mr. Harris Weinstock, one of our best-known merchants, wrote while the bill was before our legislature, he said: "In some of the mercantile enterprises in which I am interested we have been working on an 8-hour basis for women, with every satisfaction to them and to ourselves. If the 8-hour day in mercantile establishments is made a common condition in California, including the Christmas holiday season, it will work no hardship upon the employer; it will be a blessing to the woman worker, and will tend to make for a higher degree of efficiency on her part."

Then came other trades with other seasons. The candy men claimed three seasons—Christmas, Easter, and the Fourth of July. Each trade seemed to have a special season, and each predicted calamity should the bill become a law.

However, notwithstanding all the opposition, and this bill was the hardest fought of the entire session, public sentiment was so strong that the bill went through with only five dissenting votes in the entire legislature. Since it has become a law the opponents have adapted themselves very readily to the change. I have talked with many of them—owners of department stores, hotel men, manufacturers—and they have all said that the law was not at all terrible, as they supposed it would be, and they would not again oppose it.

It was also objected, in behalf of the girls themselves, that wages would be reduced. I have asked very generally, but have found only two or three instances of this kind. One was a girl who had stood behind a counter 9 hours a day for three days a week, and the other three days she had worked from 8 in the morning until 11 at night. For this she had received $9 a week. After the law went into effect I asked if her wages had been reduced, and she said, "Oh, yes; a dollar a week; but I don't mind; I'm glad to give up the extra pay for the sake of the shorter hours."

Then it was objected that women would be replaced by men. We see, however, that the only adjustment that has been necessary since the law went into effect has not been the displacing of women, but rather the employment of more. This has meant an additional expense, but we know that the expense in the end is not borne by the employers, but by the public; and it is an expense which we in California bear very willingly for the sake of a healthier, happier womanhood. This greater expense is, moreover, made up to a large extent by the greater efficiency of the girls.

Mr. Speaker, it is incredible to me that legislatures, either State or National, should refuse to pass 8-hour laws for all employees, income-tax laws, inheritance-tax laws, and laws creating public-service commissions, with powers to fix the rates of service and prices of all monopolies, except upon the hypothesis that a majority of our public legislators, or at least the leaders who control legislation, are still under the influence of the money power of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I was born and raised a conservative. I graduated from the law department of the university of my native State—Missouri—and was admitted to the bar June 5, 1896, five days before I was 21 years of age. I was elected prosecuting attorney of Montgomery County, Mo., by the largest vote given to any candidate for any office on either ticket. In 1905 I was appointed a special agent of the General Land Office by Secretary of the Interior Ethan Allen Hitchcock and sent to Oregon to aid in the land investigations being carried on in that State by the noted prosecutor, Francis J. Heney, and the equally noted detective, William J. Burns. In 1906 I resigned from the Government service and again entered the practice of law, which is a profession tending to make any citizen conservative in his tendencies relating to government.

But I desire to say here and now that I do not believe the new administration to be inducted into power this day and in a very few minutes is half as radical as it ought to be. I believe that I am more radical in my views than any Democrat or any Progressive or any Republican upon the floor of this House at the present time, or any Member who will be upon the floor of this House during the Sixty-third Congress, and yet I know that I am conservative.

The incoming President was elected by the American people because they believed he was a progressive, and yet we find that he has named for the important position of Attorney General a lawyer of New York City, James C. McReynolds. The name of Mr. McReynolds is being carried in the newspapers, undoubtedly by the incoming President's direction, as being "from Tennessee"; but the New York City directory over in the Congressional Library shows Mr. McReynolds's office address to be 129 Broadway, New York City, and his residence address No. 9 East Thirty-ninth Street, in the same city. The only previous public service that I have heard credited to Mr. McReynolds was that of a special assistant to Attorney General Wickersham under the administration of President Taft. We all know that it was because of the conservatism of the administration of President Taft that Mr. Wilson was elected, and it is safe to say that the American people do not want the affairs of the new administration conducted by men of the same views as those who controlled the Taft administration. I hope Mr. McReynolds will prove a progressive Attorney General, and if so he shall have my hearty support.

Mr. Speaker, in a few words I believe that I can convince the most skeptical listener that radical legislation and radical enforcement of laws we already have is imperatively demanded by conditions in this country. The total wealth of the United States is $125,000,000,000. At present 50 men own 40 per cent of this wealth. At present 200,000 men own 70 per cent of the wealth of the United States, leaving only 30 per cent for the remaining 91,800,000 people. This condition has been brought about by special privilege. The influence of the few men who have acquired practically all of the wealth of the United States is what I designate as the "money power" of this country.

This money power owns the Associated Press, the United Press Association, the Western Union Telegraph Co., the telephone companies, and it controls nearly all the great newspapers and all the channels of news. It is a power which has made its mailed fist felt by any public servant who does not bow to its dictatorship. The incoming President, in forming his Cabinet, is this day feeling its power. The dishonest greed of the money power has made industrial slaves of 91,800,000 of our people, while the remaining 200,000 own 70 per cent of the wealth of the United States.

It is this condition that I protest against, and in doing so I wish to repeat that I am not a radical, but a conservative. But even being a conservative, as I am, and demanding only common honesty and common decency, I do believe that I am the most radical Member of the House of Representatives of the United States. I hope and pray that a majority of the incoming Congress will be servants of the public rather than servants of the money power. I realize that this is probably a vain hope, and that at least one more presidential election will be necessary to put the public in control and to make the general welfare the motive power of this Government instead of the interests of the money power and special privilege.

At the present time one-third of the families of the United States have an income of less than $400 a year, while the other two-thirds of the families of the United States have incomes which average less than $900 per year. These are census figures. Only one family in twenty, or, in other words, one man in one hundred, has an income as high as $3,000 a year. Yet President Taft, in a recent final address to the Press Club of this city, spoke of the time when he first started out in life upon his own resources under the necessity of earning the $300 or $400 a month necessary for a man to live on.

Every consumer in this country to-day is paying practically all he earns as tribute to special privilege; and he earns comparatively little, because he is at the same time a servant of special privilege, either directly or indirectly. The remedy is to pass laws, both National and State, creating public-service commissions, with the power to fix prices, service, and rates of monopolies, based upon fair interest returns upon the actual cash investment, income-tax laws, inheritance-tax laws, and a law radically reducing the tariff all along the line and removing the tariff altogether from the articles which are controlled in this country by the trusts. Minimum-wage commissions should be created nationally and in every State in the Union. Then every man who works would be able to buy with his earnings a comfortable living for himself and family, to take a vacation of at least 30 days each year in the mountains or at the seashore, and to lay by a little for his old age besides. It does not require the scheme of a political dreamer to bring about these results. It requires only common honesty and common decency and manhood on the part of men in public office.

The people will have to educate themselves rapidly in the next year or so if they expect to get complete relief even at the presidential election of 1916. They must learn to disregard the manufactured "news" which is sent out daily for their consumption and to trust no public official who does not come out flatfooted on the side of an absolute progressive program. The official who hesitates or makes excuses is not a friend of the public. The official who is not for the public welfare openly and outspokenly is against the public welfare. Trucklers to the money power and to its servant, the public press of the United States, must be left at home in succeeding elections.

Legislators now in office by the grace of the money power sneer at other legislators who dare to defy that power and introduce measures here upon the floor of this House in favor of the public, and then advocate and vote for said measures. They denounce such faithful servants as "demagogues appealing to popular sentiment"; but the fact is that those who thus sneer are themselves the cowards, who are serving their masters, the money power that put them in office, and which power is holding the uplifted lash over their bared backs throughout the period of their service under the Dome of this Capitol. It requires something more than a demagogue to faithfully serve the great mass of humanity, which is without the power of gold and without the power and advantages of the press, and liable at any time to crucify its truest friends as the result of the misinformation circulated by its worst enemy—the money power. Yes, it requires much less courage to be conservative and serve the money power than it does to be honest and serve the public welfare.

Good Roads.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STANTON WARBURTON, OF WASHINGTON,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Tuesday, March 4, 1913.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Speaker, the Progressive Party and the Democratic Party by their national platforms both stand committed to the proposition that the National Government shall in some form give substantial aid to the States in the construction of highways. Whether wise or unwise they stand committed to this policy. Our new President—Wilson—stands especially committed to it. Every Progressive and Democratic Congressman, unless in his campaign he disavowed it, likewise stands committed to it. I believe a majority of those who bear allegiance to the Republican Party are in favor of the same policy. In addition to this, there is an almost universal demand by the people of this country that the Government shall aid the States in some form or other in the construction of highways. This is a new departure of governmental policy. It involves the expenditure of many, many millions of dollars. This demand is going to take expression in some form of statutory law in the very near future, and the great, big, serious question is, How shall this be done so that the Government shall commit no error in the form of aid it shall give the States, and that the Government shall receive in return value dollar for dollar which it expends? One who has given this subject careful thought and examined the bills that have been introduced in this Congress will readily see what a great, big, serious question confronts the next Congress. I have given the question a great deal of thought and study, and I have put my conclusions in the form of a bill which I recently introduced. I believe that the Government ought to build a system of national interstate highways that will give each State a basic system of highways with which they can connect and construct a State system of highways. I believe that this is the most substantial and economic aid that the Government can give the States and at the same time construct a national system of interstate highways.

I desire to first give a summary of my general scheme for interstate highways.

My bill proposes a complete system of interstate paved highways 16 feet wide connecting every State capital with each other and with the Capital of the United States. In preparing that part of my bill which locates the roads I used the capitals as basic points through which the roads must pass. I then began to devise a system which would do this and take in all cities of over 100,000 population and all the chief seaports, and at the same time arrange the routes so that they would run in the direction of the general movement of commerce and travel with the least possible mileage.

I think I have fairly accomplished all these objects. I think if you will carefully examine the map you will agree with me that I have done so.

The map will show the general system and roughly the routes. The general direction of all the roads and the capitals and the cities over 100,000 and the seaports through which the road must be located are named in the bill. I then provide that routes between points named must be located so as to pass through all cities of over 10,000, where it will not increase mileage over 12 per cent.

The bill also provides for branch roads to every city of a population of 20,000, providing the city can be reached by 50 miles of roadway, and in case such city can not be reached by the construction of over 50 miles of the necessary roadway to connect such city, the Government shall build 50 miles, provided the city or State will build the additional mileage. There are only about one-half dozen cities in the United States of 20,000 population or more that would not be reached without the city or municipality constructing any mileage. There are 230 cities in the United States with a population between twenty and one hundred thousand people. Two-thirds of such cities are on the main trunk highways. The salient features of the system are these:

Every city of over 100,000 population is on a main trunk highway.

Every capital in the United States is on a main trunk highway.

Every seaport in the United States over 20,000 population is on a main trunk highway.

CANADA
PACIFIC OCEAN

Over two-thirds of the people of the United States will reside on one of the highways or within 10 miles of one.

I have most carefully examined the above statement in connection with the following States; in this, as above, I count every resident of a city as living within 10 miles of a road located through it or by it. I know I am not overstating the fact when I say that the percentage of residents of each of the following States will reside on or within 10 miles of the proposed highway within the State:

Indiana, over 60 per cent; Missouri, over 59 per cent; Ohio, over 65 per cent; Pennsylvania, over 74 per cent; Illinois, over 70 per cent; New York, over 76 per cent; Massachusetts, over 80 per cent; New Jersey, over 80 per cent; Connecticut, over 80 per cent; Rhode Island, over 90 per cent; Montana, over 70 per cent; Washington, over 75 per cent; Oregon, over 70 per cent; California, over 75 per cent; Colorado, over 70 per cent; Maryland, over 70 per cent; and Delaware, over 70 per cent.

The actual mileage necessary to be constructed under the proposed bill will be about 18,000 miles or less, including branch lines.

The map undertakes to show only general direction between cities named in the bill.

If each State of the Union were to construct as many miles of road within its borders, using the road proposed to be constructed by the Government under this bill, it would have a most complete system of State roads. It would have as complete system of State roads as the one I propose would be for the United States; in fact, much more complete. Under the proposed law the more thinly settled States get a larger percentage of mileage to the population than the more thickly settled States, yet this is largely equalized by the fact that the cost of maintenance of the road in the thickly settled portions and between the very heavy centers of population will be much greater than where the travel is comparatively lighter. The one in the long run will about offset the other. The great advantage of my bill over the many proposed is the fact that it establishes a system of roads.

Under my scheme the necessary money for the payment of this work will be collected by the Government within five years after the act takes effect. The proposed bill contemplates the construction of about 18,000 miles of roads. I estimate the cost will not exceed $15,000 a mile, or $17,500 at the maximum.

I propose to raise the fund by approximately restoring the internal-revenue tax of 1879 on tobacco and set aside the additional income from this source as a national road fund.

The main difference is the tax on cigars. The law of 1879, as all our recent laws, fixed the same tax on all grades of cigars; the tax was $6 a thousand, regardless of whether the wholesale price was $35, $75, or $150 a thousand. I have always contended that this was a wholly unfair system of tax; that the tax ought to be graded so that the man who smokes a 5-cent, the man who smokes a 10-cent, and the man who smokes a 20-cent cigar would pay about the same per cent tax.

The additional tax so provided would amount to about $60,000,000 a year. It would not quite double the present internal-revenue tax on tobacco. If the proposed roads should cost $15,000 a mile, the roads will be paid for in about five years.

There is no doubt about the money that would be received under my proposed bill. It is a well-settled rule that increase of tax on a luxury does not decrease the amount consumed, though no great harm would occur if it did decrease its consumption. Such would not be the result. This has been shown by many changes in the tax on tobacco, whisky, and so forth. I am certain that we will never be able to construct national highways unless some such special fund is created, and I know of no better way to raise the fund.

Our tax on tobacco is very small. Our tax on whisky and beer and our tariff on woolen and cotton goods has not been reduced practically since the late war. The tobacco tax was reduced in 1873 because the Government was getting more revenue than it was using. It was reduced again in 1879 for the same reason, and again in 1883. Our tax on tobacco is not one-fourth of what it was during the war. It was not taken off in 1879 because there was any demand for a reduction by the consumer; it was removed simply because the Government was getting more money than it needed.

The proposed bill raises the tax on a 5-cent cigar or under fifteen-hundredths of a cent, and the tax on a 10-cent cigar or two for a quarter cigar three-tenths of a cent, and on a 15-cent cigar or above six-tenths of a cent. The result would be that a man who smokes a 5-cent cigar to be dead even on the cost of his cigars would have to reduce his smoking to 32 cigars where he now smokes 33 cigars; the man who smokes 10-cent cigars would smoke 29 cigars where he now smokes 30; the man who smokes 20-cent cigars would smoke 32 cigars where he now smokes 33. As a matter of fact, this is not the way it would work out. The manufacturer would reduce the size of the cigar proportionately and the consumer would not know the difference in the size of the cigar. One could not select the smaller one from the larger if the two sizes were laid side by side.

While the proposed increased tax on tobacco might seem heavy, as a matter of fact it will not even be noticed by the consumer. The manufacturer of a 10-cent cigar would decrease the weight of tobacco one-thirtieth, and the consumer would not notice the difference. The manufacturer of smoking tobacco would likewise decrease the size of the package about one-twelfth, and the consumer would not know the difference in the size of his package. During the Spanish-American War the tax on tobacco was increased to nearly the amount suggested, and I venture the assertion that not one consumer of tobacco out of 1,000 who reads this article ever knew the tax was raised, and never knew when the tax was taken off. The raise in the tax on tobacco will not even affect the producer of tobacco. One-half of our tobacco is exported. England imports one-half of her tobacco from us; France imports about one-half of her tobacco from us; Italy imports nearly all of hers. The price is regulated by the foreign market much more so than is the price of wheat and corn, and is not affected by the tax. For instance, when England imports tobacco which she buys on the market here she puts an internal-revenue tax upon it of five times as much as proposed in my law; France and Italy about six times as much. The farm price of tobacco, as a matter of fact, has been a little higher in this country during the times when we have had the heaviest tax upon it. This can be easily ascertained by anyone who will take the trouble to study the history of our tax, together with the prices of tobacco paid the farmer.

The building of roads in this country has been frightfully neglected. It is the one great necessary internal improvement that has been forgotten. We are as far behind every civilized country in this work as we are ahead of them in other lines. We are certainly the laggards here. It is useless for us to console ourselves with the suggestion that we are a new country and therefore our frightful road conditions are excusable. In many of our Eastern States that have been settled for one or two hundred years and are thickly settled and wealthy the road conditions are as bad to-day as they were one or two hundred years ago. We have spent millions—yes, hundreds of millions—of dollars in attempting to improve worthless rivers, but practically nothing on good roads that would be of the greatest service to us. We have spent hundreds of millions of dollars on public buildings in comparatively small cities that has been of no considerable advantage to them or to the general welfare, but would have been of immense value to the whole country if these millions had been put into a system of interstate highways. The States with great seaports that have had hundreds of millions of dollars of Government money expended on their harbors ought to be willing to have the Government devote a like amount to a system of interstate highways that would be of the greatest benefit to them and to every State and section of the Union. It has been said that the United States can not afford to do this. I ask, Can the United States not afford to do this? The little island of Jamaica in the Caribbean Sea, which is about one-tenth the size of Virginia and about two-fifths the population and about one-half the size of Massachusetts and about one-fourth of the population, settled about the same time that these States were settled, and with nothing like the wealth, has built and maintains in excellent condition about 1,000 miles of the finest macadam and hard-surface roads. These roads have made this little island a paradise and bring it its largest revenue. France has constructed within the past 50 or 75 years and maintains about 20,000 miles of the finest national roads. She is now hard-surfacing them. If France can afford to maintain 24,000 miles of national highways, with her comparatively small area and with one-third of our population, leaving to the provinces, as she does, the burden of constructing and maintaining the State system, it seems as though the United States, with her area and her wealth and population, could well afford to construct and maintain at least 18,000 miles of interstate highways.

The highways I propose will, if constructed and as soon as constructed, become great lines of commerce and travel and will be used by all classes of people. There is nothing that promises so much in reducing the cost of transportation for the short hauls, such as 30, 40, or 50 miles, as the autotruck. No sooner are hard-surface roads completed to large centers than the autotruck appears on the road as the freight carrier for the distances I have mentioned. The wholesale house immediately begins to deliver its goods to small towns and farming communities by the autotruck. The big farmer hauls his product to the larger centers by the autotruck, where heretofore he has merely hauled it to the nearest railway station. The dairyman and the truck farmer can deliver their goods by the autotruck two or three times the distance that they could theretofore deliver them and in cheaper and far better condition. The city gets its butter and eggs and milk and garden products, and all kinds of farm produce from a much larger territory and at a much less cost than heretofore. The farm life is made more attractive. The farmer who lives on such a road within 10 miles of a city has all the advantages of both city and country life. The saving to the farmer in marketing his goods is very large. Our rich people go abroad every year, spending, it is estimated, over $100,000,000 in touring the Continent of Europe, very largely for the reason that to tour this country is simply a muddy, back-breaking job, while over there they can get the finest roads. A large part of these millions could be saved to this country by such a system of roads. I was talking with Judge Gibbons, of Los Angeles, about this matter, and he agreed with me that while his country was making an immense amount of money out of the tourists on account of their splendid hard-road system, that the great big benefit came from the use by them of the autotruck and freight wagon. I asked him to give me briefly the experience of his people along these lines. He did so, and I here insert his letter in full. You will observe that he never mentions the tourists in his statement, though everybody knows that Los Angeles profits very heavily by them. He thinks, as I think, that the great big benefit of a system of this kind comes from the autotruck and freight wagon, although a very great benefit comes from the tourist and the pleasure of the people who live along them. He says:

It is with much pleasure that I shall endeavor to comply with your request to furnish you some information concerning the development by Los Angeles County of a highway system of a character to permit its use by heavy vehicles, such as autotrucks.

Four years ago the people of our county voted an issue of $3,500,000 in highway bonds for the purpose of constructing a system of about 300 miles of highways, so designed as to reach every center of population in the county, and so arranged that the city of Los Angeles, the principal center of population in the county, should be the center of the highway system. You will understand that the city of Los Angeles is surrounded by a number of smaller cities and towns, varying in population from 500 to 40,000, at distances of from 5 to 35 miles.

The type of highway adopted was a road 16 feet wide, composed of a broken-stone foundation 6 inches in depth at the center and thinning somewhat toward the sides, covered by a finishing coat of oil macadam, composed of finely crushed rock and gravel mixed with crude oil, the road supported on each side by shoulders of crushed rock and gravel 3 feet in width. This type of construction was adopted as being most likely to resist the wear of auto vehicles, the oil finish offering, it was conceived, the best resistance to the suction effect of automobile tires upon the surface of the highway.

Portions of the highway system in a large part of our county were not in proximity to deposits of either gravel or stone. Furthermore, our contractors had had no experience in highway building, and no gravel pits or stone quarries suitable for furnishing material had been opened when the first advertisements for bids for constructing portions of this highway system were made. As a result, the first parts of the system constructed cost the county about $14,000 per mile. The construction has been underway for something more than three years, and the last sections are now under construction, and the system will be entirely completed within the next few weeks.

Within the past year, and since gravel pits have been developed and stone quarries opened up for furnishing the proper material, the county has awarded contracts for constructing sections of the highway at a price of $7,500 per mile, or a little more than one-half the price of the first contracts awarded.

The economic advantage of the system as developed has been fully demonstrated. Notwithstanding the fact that Los Angeles is the center of three systems of steam railroads which have running out of the city to various centers of population 13 lines of road, and of a system of electric suburban lines aggregating 1,000 miles in extent which reaches every center of population in the county, there has been established along our highway system, as fast as completed, lines of autotrucks which have successfully competed in rates for transporting freight with both steam and electric roads. As an illustration: I was told a few days ago by the manager of one of our largest morning papers that his paper and another morning paper had been carrying their papers by electric car to a town about 30 miles from Los Angeles. Upon investigation they found that they could secure this service by truck at a large reduction, and they have established a truck service in place of the electric car service at a saving of 45 per cent of the cost of carrying their papers on the electric suburban car.

One of our largest lumber companies, whose lumber is landed at Redondo, a seaport 15 miles from the city and which is connected with the city by two lines of electric road and a line of steam road, has established a trucking service for transporting its lumber from the wharf to its yard in the city, and claims that by doing so it has materially reduced the cost of transportation.

It has become the custom of the merchants in the smaller towns surrounding Los Angeles to have their goods transported by trucks from the wholesale houses to their stores. They claim that they have not only secured a cheaper transportation but they avoid the necessity of two handlings by having the goods loaded on the truck at the wholesale house and delivered directly to their stores at the point of destination, thus avoiding the handling from the wholesale establishment to the car and from the car to their stores.

So effective has our system proven in developing the handling of freight by autotrucks that a good deal of freight is now handled in that way between the cities of Los Angeles and San Bernardino, a distance of 65 miles, although only one-half of this distance is covered by our county highway system, the remainder being over fairly good road with a natural gravel surface.

Of course, in the matter of hauling produce to the city our farmers and dairymen have found the improved highways of enormous benefit, as they not only greatly increase the amount of load that can be carried, but also greatly shorten the time for transportation by enabling them to use auto vehicles. I know of one instance where a company has established an autotruck service between the city and a seaside suburb 16 miles away, where thousands of our citizens have seaside homes. It makes with each autotruck four round trips a day, leaving on the first trip at 6 o'clock in the morning and delivering its last load as late as 6 or 7 o'clock at night.

The harbor commission of the city of Los Angeles, of which I was for several years a member, made a very careful investigation of the use of autotrucks for transporting freight, with the idea of encouraging this method of transportation between the business center of our city and our harbor, 22 miles away. We found in the course of our investigation that for the last three or four years there has been operated out of Paris, France, for a distance of 100 miles, in competition with steam railroads, an auto vehicle service known as the Renaud Road trains, consisting of as many as four or five truck units pulled by autotruck and controlled by air brakes, something like our steam roads.

Two years ago the people of our State voted an issue of $18,000,000 of bonds for the construction of two lines of highways extending throughout the full length of the State, so arranged that either by the main lines or by short branches they could be connected with the county seats of the various counties in the State. Our State highway commission has adopted a type of highway of a solid concrete base, finished with an oil macadam surface. Construction upon portions of the State's system was begun some months ago, and they have obtained bids for the construction under $8,000 per mile. The highway is 16 feet in width, and it is believed that the type adopted will resist the heaviest autotrucks used. The people of the State are looking forward to the development of the State's system with the conviction that it will have a great deal to do with the adjustment of transportation rates, and will in many instances relieve them of excessive rates now charged by the transportation companies.

I have no doubt that if your plan for a national highway should be adopted and carried out it would be found to be of enormous advantage to every center of population that it reaches and to the country surrounding those centers within a radius of 100 miles in facilitating the transportation of freight of all kinds.

Trusting that the foregoing information may be of some use to you in the great enterprise that you have undertaken, I beg to remain,

If I may proceed for a few minutes, I would like to discuss the question of the advisability of the Government appropriating money for the construction of roads and then dividing it among the States in the proportion that the population of each State bears to the population of the United States, and then granting this aid on the condition that the State will appropriate a like amount. This proposition seems fair on its face, and it would seem as though it might be an advisable scheme. But if we investigate it carefully we will readily see that, in fact, it is based on a false theory. I think we will all agree that whatever the Government does along the line of road construction or of aid to road construction it ought to be with the view of securing a system of interstate roads. This can not be done under the above scheme. It is wholly contrary to such a system of roads. One of the bills introduced, for instance, provides for an appropriation of $25,000,000, to be divided among the States, as above suggested, in proportion to the population. Under this scheme New York would get $2,500,000; Pennsylvania, about $2,100,000; Massachusetts, about $1,000,000; Nevada would receive about $25,000; South Dakota, about $125,000; Virginia, about $500,000; and Tennessee, about $500,000. Massachusetts has, in round numbers, about 8,000 square miles; Tennessee, 41,000 square miles; Virginia, 40,000 square miles; South Dakota, 76,000 square miles; and Nevada, 109,000 square miles. Certainly Tennessee and Virginia need as many miles of highways per thousand square miles as Massachusetts. Yet under such a system Massachusetts, with only one-fifth as many square miles as Virginia or Tennessee, would get twice as much aid from the Government; or, in other words, would get ten times as much aid per thousand square miles as the two States mentioned. Under the system proposed by me, Massachusetts would get a larger mileage to the thousand square miles than either Tennessee or Virginia, yet each of these States would get a much larger mileage. But, on the other hand, Massachusetts would, in fact, get an equal advantage from it. For instance, eighty people out of a hundred in Massachusetts would reside within 10 miles of my proposed highways, while only fifty persons out of a hundred in Tennessee would reside within 10 miles of my proposed highways.

Massachusetts would contribute more to this fund in proportion to the mileage of roads than she would receive, but this would be equalized in the end by reason of the fact that the maintenance of the road per mile would be a great deal larger in Massachusetts than in Tennessee.

Reverting to the statement I have just made that dividing of the appropriations in proportion to the population would wholly prevent the construction of a system of interstate highways, I want to say that any real interstate road scheme must contemplate ultimately at least three transcontinental highways from East to West. Under the scheme to appropriate $25,000,000 and divide it as above mentioned, I have called attention to the fact that Nevada would only get $25,000. As soon as she would appropriate a like amount she would have $50,000. If we are to have three transcontinental roads, the central one of them must necessarily pass through Nevada, which is at least 500 miles wide, and the $25,000 that the Government would appropriate, together with Nevada's $25,000, would build about 3 miles across the State. It will be seen at once that such a scheme would prevent the construction of such a transcontinental line.

A central transcontinental line would have to cross Wyoming. Under the $25,000,000 appropriation Wyoming would get only about $35,000, providing she appropriated a like amount, making a total of $70,000. This sum would build about 5 miles of road across Wyoming out of a necessary mileage of more than 500 miles. What is true of these two States in a measure is true of other States through which such a transcontinental line would pass. A southern transcontinental line must pass through Arizona and New Mexico. Under such a scheme Arizona would get Federal aid of about $50,000, and by appropriating a like amount a total of $100,000 would be available, or enough to build about 7 miles of road out of a necessary 500 miles of road. New Mexico would get about $75,000 out of the $25,000,000. If she should appropriate another $75,000 a sufficient sum would be available to build 10 miles of road out of a necessary five hundred odd miles of road. At that rate it would take 50 years to construct a road across the State. A northern transcontinental road must pass through one of the Dakotas, Montana, and Idaho, with a similar result as to mileage in each of these States as in the States on the central or southern transcontinental line. To undertake to build any transcontinental road on any such scheme is wholly out of the question. It can not be done. The scheme would fail in the same way in many other Southern and Western States. It is wholly subversive of any national system of roads.

It is my conviction that we will never be able to get a system of interstate highways unless the Government constructs the roads. There is another argument that might be made in favor of an interstate system of roads and against dividing up any sums that the United States may appropriate in proportion to population.

The heavy centers of population are just as much interested in an interstate system of highways as they are in an interstate system of railroads. New York, Chicago, and Boston are just as much interested in a system of railroads throughout the country as they are in a system within their respective States. Their prosperity depends quite as much upon one as it does upon the other. Iowa needs as many railroads per 1,000 square miles as Massachusetts. It would be just as absurd to argue that if the Government of the United States were to undertake now the construction of railway systems that it should give the mileage to the different States in proportion to the population. In such a case Massachusetts would get one and a-half times as many miles of roads as Iowa would, though she has 8,000 square miles to Iowa's 55,000 square miles. In such an event either Massachusetts would be immensely oversupplied or Iowa would not be one-fifth supplied. If Iowa were to be supplied with as many miles of railroads as she now has, and you were to give Massachusetts one and a half times as many miles as Iowa has, you would be piling steel rails on top of steel rails in Massachusetts. In interstate highways as in interstate railroads there must be some proper relation between people to be supplied with such facilities and the square miles to be covered. I think such a scheme is wholly impracticable and based on a false theory.

The proposition that the Government should distribute its appropriations for highways in the States in proportion to the population of the States could not be defended on any ground. It would be just as logical to contend that the Government should establish rural mail routes in the different States in proportion to the population. For illustration, Massachusetts has 7,568 miles of rural free delivery and star-route service. Tennessee has 39,946 miles of rural-delivery and star-route service. So if we should distribute $25,000,000 annually, as proposed in one or more of the bills introduced for good roads, and distribute that amount in the States in proportion to the population, Massachusetts would get about $1,000,000 on account of her 7,500 miles of rural mail service and Tennessee would get $500,000 for her 40,000 miles of rural mail service. To put it in another way, Massachusetts would get $10 a mile for rural service as opposed to Tennessee's $1. Such a scheme would have but little more basis to stand upon than would the proposition that the Government should distribute its appropriations for rivers and harbors in the different States in proportion to their population. As I have said, the States under my bill which have the largest population—such as New York, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania—would not get the mileage in proportion to the population that many of the States would with a less population and fewer large cities; but this is equalized in a large measure by the fact that the cost of maintenance of the roads in such States would be very much heavier than in the States of lesser population. But, in addition to this, we can not vote appropriations for public improvements and distribute them in the States in proportion to the population. No such a proposition has heretofore been advanced. The farming sections and the interior of the United States have been paying their proportion of the hundreds of millions of dollars that have been expended by the United States Government in the improvement of rivers and harbors, in the construction of large public buildings in the large cities, in the construction of forts and shipbuilding plants and for the maintenance of them. To be sure, the improvements in a sense are for the benefit of all the people, but the large cities and heavy centers of population get a special and peculiar advantage from the expenditures of these moneys, as opposed to communities and States where the moneys are not expended. So if the large cities of the United States contribute in this instance a little more than their share toward the building of interstate highways that will be of special benefit to the interior and farming communities they have no ground for complaint. Under this system which I propose most of the larger States would get on an average of about 450 miles of the highest class of road, to be maintained by the Government. Is this not fully of as much advantage to the State as though it were paying one-half of the sum and 900 miles were to be constructed?

It gets the 450 miles without cost. In fact, it gets more than that because it receives a dollar for every dollar that the improvements on its roads will be worth to the Government in improving such roads. In many States it will be a large sum which the States will have for the improvement of their roads. Is it not a far better proposition all around for the Government to expend whatever money it proposes to set aside for the State in the construction of roads and not to divide the responsibility for the economic use of the money with State officials? It is ordinarily hard enough to prevent fraud and graft where you can center responsibility on one head. It can not be done where responsibility is divided between the United States Government and the States. If the Government is going to spend hundreds of millions of dollars on State roads some Government official ought to be held responsible for everything concerning the construction of the roads to the end that the Government would get a dollar's worth of first-class road for every dollar it expends. My bill provides for about 18,000 miles of actual road construction, including branch roads. It provides for branch roads to every city of a population of 20,000.

There is another theory of Government aid to States in the construction of roads—that is to offer aid to each State in an amount equal to that which the State is willing to appropriate regardless of population, and to divide the supervision of construction and maintenance with such State. I think nearly every one that has tried to work out a theory of Government aid has started with some such proposition. I know I did, and for a long time I clung tenaciously to this theory, believing I could work it out. But the more one studies the proposition the more impracticable he finds it. I think that is the conclusion everyone comes to after he has given the subject a great deal of thought and study. It will not work out. It is a fine theory but impracticable. I think everyone will agree that in so far as the Government goes into its Treasury to give aid to the construction of roads in the States that it ought to have two things primarily in view: First, ultimately a system of interstate roads; second, they must be of the highest quality, because such construction is the most economical both in use and maintenance. Neither of these two essentials is possible under any such scheme. It is impossible to get such a system of roads because, in fact, a big majority of the States are unable to furnish their one-half. If a State or any considerable number of States will not or are unable to appropriate their one-half, then the system of road fails. A system of interstate roads at all commensurate with the needs of the country can not be done much under 18,000 miles of road. The system I propose amounts to about that, and I defy any man to cut out any considerable mileage without destroying the system. The branch roads might be omitted, and yet if they were an injustice would be done to the State where the heavy centers of population exist and whose people pay their full proportion of the tax necessary to raise the fund for construction. Treating my proposed system as fair to all States, and I do not believe anyone will deny that it is, let us see how it would work out if we were to require each State to pay one-half of the construction of such a system.

Take the States of Tennessee and North Carolina under this system. Tennessee and North Carolina, on account of their situation, will get their full share of mileage. North Carolina will get about 600 miles of road. At $15,000 a mile it would cost about $9,000,000. She would be required under such a scheme to appropriate $4,500,000 as her share of the cost of the road. This would be an impossibility, or at least she in all probability would not be able to do it. If she could not do so, or would not do so, then your Atlantic system is gone. You have a missing link that can not be supplied. Tennessee would likewise have over 600 miles of roads under my system. She likewise would be compelled to appropriate over $4,500,000 as her half. This she could not or probably would not do. If she could not or would not appropriate this sum, then your system of roads between the Alleghenies and the Mississippi is gone. If both States were unable to or unwilling to appropriate their share above suggested, then your whole system east of the Mississippi would fail, no matter how willing or able the States north or south of these two States might be to appropriate their share for such a system. But the truth is there would be a great many other Western and Southern States that would be unable to appropriate their one-half for the system within their respective States. None of the Rocky Mountain States would be able to appropriate their one-half, and no transcontinental line could be built. That part of the system would be gone. Only those States that do not need Government aid would be able to accept Government aid under such conditions. There are two reasons why the Government should construct such a system. First, it is immensely interested in a system of national highways, both as to commerce and as a matter of military defense. Second, it is necessary to aid the States in the construction of roads. It accomplishes all these objects by building such a system as I suggest. Would it not be a wiser policy to build these roads and leave the State free to expend its own money in supplementing the system the Government builds in such States?

I would like to add, if I may, some more extended observations on the advisability of raising the funds for the construction out of an increased tax on tobacco. I advocate an increase of the internal-revenue tax on tobacco for the purpose of raising the necessary fund for the construction of roads for the simple reason that tobacco is a luxury and bears but a small part of the tax it ought to bear for the purpose of running the Government. Our low tax on tobacco was not brought about by any scientific method of placing a tax upon it, as I will show in a minute. Whether you raise the necessary revenue to construct a road system from the internal-revenue tax on tobacco or not, the increased rate should be adopted and the tax on some necessary of life reduced a like amount. This admitted luxury, tobacco, bears a less tax than almost any other commodity in comparison with its value when sold on the market. Compared with any other luxury one might say it is not taxed at all.

Two years ago I had occasion to review the tax on tobacco in the House, and I went very thoroughly into the question, and I am going to quote very freely from the remarks I then made, so the data I give will bear date as of 1911. What I then said is essentially true now. If I were to get a statement from the Treasury Department asking for the amount of revenue that would be received under my proposed law for last year, and the amount actually received last year, the comparative figures would be about the same. I desire to quote freely from the speech I then made.

The internal-revenue tax on fermented liquor is the same to-day as it was at the highest point during the Civil War. It has never been lowered one penny. It was doubled during the Spanish War, but when that war was over the tax was restored to the point of the Civil War. Our war tax on distilled spirits was for a short time reduced from an average of about $1.50 to 60 cents a gallon in 1868.

In 1872 it was raised to 70 cents a gallon; in 1875 it was again raised to 90 cents a gallon; and in 1894 it was raised to $1.10 a gallon, and the tax has remained at the last figure ever since 1894. The tax on distilled liquors since 1894 has been about as high as the average tax during the Civil War. The tax on tobacco from its highest point during the Civil War has been lowered from year to year until it is now but a small fraction of that tax. The changes have been quite numerous, and I have prepared a table showing the rate and date of each law reducing the same. Smoking and chewing tobacco and snuff in each law are fixed at the same rate, there being one or two exceptions in relation to snuff, which I will not notice, so I will speak of them as tobacco. Cigars and cheroots have been taxed by each law at the same rate, and I will speak of them together as cigars. Cigarettes by each law have borne about one-half of the rate of cigars, so I will not especially mention them. I am discussing only the internal-revenue tax. I am not taking into consideration at all import or tariff duties.

Date of enactment.	Tobacco (per pound).	Cigars (per thousand).
	Cents.
1864	15-35	[1] $8.00-$40.00
1865	30-40	10.00
1866	30-40	4.00
1868	32	5.00
1872	20	5.00
1875	24	6.00
1879	16	6.00
1883	8	3.00
1890	6	3.00
1898	12	3.60
1901	9.6	3.00
1902	6	3.00
1909	8	3.00

[1] According to value.

Now, we will observe that from the highest point during the war, 40 cents a pound, tobacco has been reduced to 8 cents a pound. Cigars at the highest point of the Civil War were $8 to $40, according to the value, per thousand; they were reduced to $3 a thousand in 1883, and they have remained at that point all the time, except during the Spanish War, when they were slightly raised.

So it clearly appears, while the tax on whisky or distilled spirits is about the same as that of the Civil War tax, and the tax on fermented liquors, beer, and ale is equal to that of the highest Civil War tax, our tax on tobacco has been reduced from time to time until it is but a fraction of the Civil War tax. Our present tax is not one-fourth of what it was during the Civil War and up to 1872; two-fifths of what it was from 1872 to 1875; one-third of what it was from 1875 to 1879: one-half of what it was from 1879 to 1883.

While the foregoing table shows that our tax on tobacco is but a pittance compared with what it was during the 20 years following the Civil War, and the tax is insignificant compared with the tax on other luxuries, it does not give one a full idea of what a small ad valorem tax it really is.

If we were to increase our tax on tobacco 100 per cent, it would equal the tax in effect from 1879 to 1883; if we were to increase it 300 per cent, it would equal the tax in effect from 1875 to 1879; if we were to increase it 250 per cent, it would equal the tax in effect from 1872 to 1875; and if we were to increase it 400 per cent, it would then equal the tax in effect from 1864 to 1872.

Our present tax on a 5-cent cigar is 6 per cent of the retail price; our present tax on a 25-cent cigar is 1.2 per cent of the retail price; our present tax on a 50-cent cigar equals six-tenths of 1 per cent of the retail price.

Our tax on sugar represents about 36 per cent of the price of retail sugar in the city of Washington. The tariff is almost five times as much on a dollar's worth of sugar as the tax on a dollar's worth of smoking tobacco or on a dollar's worth of 5-cent cigars, 12 times as much as the tax on a dollar's worth of 10-cent cigars, 30 times as much as the tax on a dollar's worth of 25-cent cigars, and 60 times as great as the tax on $1 worth of 50-cent cigars.

When one of our millionaires buys a dollar's worth of 50-cent cigars he pays the Government six-tenths of 1 cent revenue; when he buys a dollar's worth of 25-cent cigars he pays the Government a revenue of 1.2 cents; when he buys a dollar's worth of two-for-a-quarter cigars he pays the Government in revenue 2.4 cents. When his gardener buys a dollar's worth of nickel cigars or of smoking tobacco he pays the Government a revenue of 8 cents; when his washerwoman buys $1 worth of granulated sugar at the market price in Washington—5½ cents a pound—36 cents is exacted from her on account of our tariff on that necessary of life.

Snuff—common, ordinary snuff—sells for about 75 cents a pound and pays a tax of 8 cents a pound, or a tax equal to 10 per cent of its retail price. Would it not be good, decent legislation to tax this not altogether delicate and refined luxury 36 cents per pound and thus raise our revenue $10,000,000 a year, and put the revenue where needed so badly—building of Government roads?

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, at my request, in 1911 gave me in detail the amounts of smoking and chewing tobacco and snuff, cigars, and cigarettes that were withdrawn for consumption the year previous, so that I might determine what the revenues of the Government for the fiscal year ending 1910 would have been if the internal-revenue law of 1875 and the internal-revenue law of 1879 were in force.

The internal revenue that we would have received for the amount of tobacco consumed for the fiscal year 1910 if the internal-revenue tax of April, 1879, had been in force would have been, in round numbers, $138,000,000, as opposed to $58,000,000 actually received under the existing law. If the internal-revenue law of 1875 had been in force on the tobacco consumed for the year 1910, instead of the Government getting $58,000,000 it would have collected $178,000,000. It must be borne in mind that the tax in this law of 1879 was not reduced because it was too high, because there was any demand for the reduction of it by anyone interested in the industry or by the consumer, but because the Government found it necessary to reduce its income—to check its increasing surplus. Why should we not restore the law of 1879 when we need the revenue so much for the construction of good roads?

The law of 1875 reduced the war tax 25 per cent; the law of 1879 further reduced the tax to about 50 per cent of the war tax. So there could be no excuse for the third reduction of 1883, which again reduced the tobacco tax to one-fourth of the Civil War tax, except the desire to still further reduce the revenue.

Mr. Beveridge, in his great speech on tobacco in the United States Senate in 1899, and to whom I am indebted for much information, said:

To bring home to us more clearly the grotesque littleness of our present tax compared with that of other countries, I have had computed a table, which I shall insert in my remarks, showing what our revenue would be if we taxed tobacco as these other countries taxed tobacco.

For example, if we taxed tobacco at the same rate that England taxes tobacco, we would get $380,086,000. If we taxed tobacco at the rate that Austria taxes it, we would get $202,884,000 every year; at the rate that Hungary taxes it, $169,498,000 every year. If we taxed tobacco at the rate that France taxes tobacco, we would get $436,585,000 of revenue every year from that single source of taxation. If we taxed tobacco at the rate that Italy taxes tobacco, we would get $447,675,000 every year.

Our internal-revenue tax on tobacco yielded last year $57,889,000.

Over one-half of the tobacco consumed in Great Britain is imported from this country and bought in the open market, and when it reaches England it is taxed 74 cents a pound, which the consumer pays; we furnish France with over half of the tobacco consumed by the French people, and this tobacco pays a tax when it reaches France of 85 cents a pound; we furnish Italy with practically all the tobacco that country consumes, and when it reaches Italy it pays a tax of 93 cents a pound.

It might be well to observe that probably the French and English people pay no tax which is less felt and about which there is less complaint.

THE TAX ON TOBACCO WAS REDUCED IN 1879 AND AGAIN IN 1883 BECAUSE THE GOVERNMENT DID NOT NEED THE REVENUE.

It may be asked by those who do not recall the history of the reduction of the tax on tobacco in 1879 and 1883 why these reductions were made. I want to recall the fact that they were made in order to prevent a large surplus in our Treasury.

During the preceding years the income of the Government had been exceeding its expenditures by a large amount. The Government was collecting more revenue than it needed to meet its fixed charges, and the question was, What tax should the Government reduce in order to prevent a further accumulation?

Our protected interests objected to a reduction of duty on imports and were successful in preventing a reduction of the tariff. The internal-revenue tax on tobacco was adopted as the easiest and most satisfactory way of reducing our large and then growing surplus. This was the sole reason for the reduction made in this tax at both of these dates. It was not because the Government or Congress regarded the tax as too high; it was not because the consumers of tobacco were objecting to the tax; it was not because the farmers who raised the tobacco demanded or requested it. It was done in each instance solely for the purpose of cutting down the revenue. It was cut down for this express purpose, and this amounted to a notice to the world that it would be and should be restored whenever the Government's needs required. No man can complain if the Government restores this tax when it should be restored.

Who would complain if the tax of 1883 or 1879 on tobacco were restored?

The Hon. Green B. Raum, then Commissioner of Internal Revenue, protested against the reduction of the internal-revenue tax on tobacco in a special report to Congress. After stating the amount of money required by the Government and the amount of its revenue, he showed that we were collecting from $70,000,000 to $80,000,000 more than we needed, and then says:

"It is an old and sound maxim that no more revenue should be raised than is necessary for an economical administration of the Government and a gradual reduction of the public debt.

"Therefore it becomes obvious that a reduction of from seventy to eighty millions in the annual revenues of the country could be safely entered upon; and, in my judgment, such a reduction is urgently called for. I respectfully offer some suggestions for your consideration in this regard.

"The great bulk of internal-revenue taxation is derived from distilled spirits—about nine-tenths of which are used as a beverage—malt liquors, tobacco, and cigars. These are not articles of necessary consumption, but are articles of luxury, the taxes upon which are readily paid by the consumers, and no one need consume them.

"I am strongly of the opinion that so long as the principle of deriving part of the revenue of the Government from internal taxation is retained, these articles and the dealers therein are proper subjects for taxation. There is no demand on the part of consumers of these products for the remission of the taxes imposed upon them; there is no public sentiment calling for their repeal. On the contrary, the general current of public opinion seems to be in favor of their retention."

This is a strong argument against the reduction of the tax in 1879. His advice was not heeded, and the tax on tobacco was reduced from 24 to 16 cents a pound, and again in 1883 to 8 cents.

In the annual report of Gen. Raum for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, the report bearing date November 24, 1879, referring to the reduction of the internal-revenue tax on tobacco, he says:

"Experience has shown that no material advantage has inured to the consumer [of tobacco] in the reduction of price by reason of the reduction of the tax."

One of the arguments that has been raised against increasing the internal-revenue tax on this luxury is that it will injure the farmer who raises it. The opponents of the increase of this tax—those who do not desire the Government to obtain any other large source of revenue which will enable Congress to reduce the tariff—warn us solemnly and with great unction that if we raise the tax on tobacco the farmer will be greatly affected if not ruined. To one who has not made a study of this question this argument may seem very plausible, but in fact nothing is further from the truth. History shows us over and over again that a large or small tax on a luxury of this kind has no effect on the price of the raw ingredients used in the production of such luxuries or on the amount consumed.

The history of tobacco since America was discovered, when tobacco came into use, shows conclusively that the tax on tobacco has nothing whatever to do with the price paid to the farmer. The average price of tobacco on the farm has been quite as high when our internal-revenue tax has been one, two, three, four, five, and six times as high as our present tax. Whenever we have made the heaviest reduction in our internal-revenue tax on tobacco the price of tobacco on the farm has not been increased a fraction of a cent.

In 1879 we took off 8 cents a pound. The farm price of tobacco prior to that time was 8 cents per pound. Did the farmer get this 8 cents that was removed from the internal-revenue tax? Not at all, though the tax removed was equal to the price of the farm product.

In 1883 we again reduced the internal-revenue tax on tobacco 8 cents per pound, the then prevailing price of tobacco on the farm was about 8 cents a pound. Did this increase the value of the tobacco on the farm? Not a particle. The farmer did not receive one penny advance, nor a fraction of a penny advance, for his tobacco.

The average price of tobacco from 1875 to 1883 was 7.7 cents per pound. The internal-revenue tax on tobacco for the first four years of this time was 24 cents a pound; for the last four years it was 16 cents a pound.

The average price of tobacco from 1885 to 1895 was 8 cents a pound, while the internal-revenue tax on tobacco was only 6 cents a pound as compared with 24 cents and 16 cents a pound from 1879 to 1883.

The average price of tobacco from 1895 to 1905 was 7.2 cents a pound, with an internal-revenue tax of only 6 cents a pound; the farm price was one-half a cent a pound less than from 1875 to 1883, when the tax was 24 and 16 cents a pound.

The average price of tobacco on the farm from 1900 to 1905 was 7.1 cents per pound.

It will be seen that the farm price during these five years was six-tenths of a cent less a pound than it was from 1875 to 1883, when the revenue tax was 24 cents and 16 cents a pound.

From 1865 to 1872 the tax on tobacco was 32 cents a pound, the highest tax ever placed by the United States on tobacco. During these years while this tax was in force the average price of tobacco was 9.8 cents per pound on the farm, the highest average price in the history of this country except during the war.

From July, 1898, until May, 1901, the tax on tobacco was doubled; that is to say, it was raised from 6 cents to 12 cents a pound. In 1901 it was reduced from 12 cents to 9 cents a pound, and in 1902 it was restored to the pre-war tax of 6 cents a pound.

The farmer received as large a price during the years the Spanish-American War tax was in force as he did the three years preceding the war or the three years following the war.

If we compare the prices of tobacco for the years mentioned, it will be observed that the farm price of tobacco was as high and even higher when the revenue taxes were the highest.

We ship our enormous surplus abroad. The price of tobacco raised in this country is controlled by the price abroad, as is our cotton. The price is fixed by the law of supply and demand. The tax of 74, 85, and 93 cents levied by the countries who consume the major portion of tobacco that we export no more determine the price of the raw article than does our tax of 8 cents a pound.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CURTIS H. GREGG,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 4, 1913.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks I submit the following:

EXHIBIT A.

OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF THE THIRD BIENNIAL MEETING OR CONVENTION OF THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC LEAGUE OF CLUBS, HELD AT THE RALEIGH HOTEL, WASHINGTON, D. C., DECEMBER 3 AND 4, 1912.

The third biennial meeting of the National Democratic League of Clubs was called to order at 3.30 p. m., Tuesday, December 3, 1912, by the president, Hon. William C. Liller, of Indianapolis. In the absence of the general secretary, Mr. Leopold M. Brown, of New York, was chosen as secretary of the meeting.

Acting Secretary Brown then read a copy of the official call for the meeting, as follows:

OFFICIAL CALL.

NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC LEAGUE OF CLUBS,
Indianapolis, Ind.

THIRD BIENNIAL MEETING NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC LEAGUE OF CLUBS, WASHINGTON, D. C., DECEMBER 3 AND 4, 1912.

To the Associated Democratic Clubs and Associations of the United States:

The third biennial meeting or convention of the National Democratic League of Clubs will be held at Washington, D. C., Tuesday and Wednesday, December 3 and 4, 1912. Headquarters will be established at the Raleigh Hotel, Pennsylvania Avenue and Twelfth Street NW.

The purpose of this meeting is to elect officers and transact such other business as may properly come before it.

* * * * * * *

The deliberations of the third biennial meeting or convention will be participated in by the officers of the National Democratic League of Clubs, the presidents of the various State leagues or federations of Democratic clubs, and the duly qualified delegates or representatives of the various federated clubs and associations. Each regularly enrolled club or association is entitled to elect one representative and one alternate to act for it. Each State league or federation of Democratic clubs federated with the national league is entitled to 10 representatives at large.

Federated or enrolled organizations which are unable to send representatives may be represented by regularly delegated proxies, certified by the regularly constituted officers of such organizations.

It is earnestly hoped that every club or association, as well as all State leagues or federations of clubs, will arrange to be represented, so that this meeting may be representative in character and Democratic in spirit.

By authority of the general executive board:

WILLIAM C. LILLER, President.

Official:

ROBERT J. BEATTY,
General Secretary.

President Liller then addressed the convention.

Address of Hon. William C. Liller, president National Democratic League of Clubs, before the third biennial meeting, Washington, D. C., December 3, 1912.

"Mr. LILLER. Gentlemen of the convention and fellow Democrats, this is truly a most auspicious occasion. To me, personally, it affords genuine pleasure and much gratification because it marks the consummation of my hopes, your hopes, my ambitions, your ambitions—shared alike by every true Democrat everywhere.

"Five years ago Congressman William Sulzer, soon to be governor of the great Empire State of New York, and I, in discussing the future of the Democratic Party, deplored the fact that no effort was being made to interest or attract the support of the young men of the country to the Democratic Party.

"We had then, as we have now, great faith in the young men of America. We knew that the young men of to-day will be our leaders and governors to-morrow. We knew the young men were intelligent, progressive, and independent, and able to see the wrongs in government and the good and bad points in political parties, and that they are fair and honest and wise enough to act upon their own judgment. We knew that the young men needed only to be organized and educated, and that if we could succeed in reaching them they would not be slaves to parties as their fathers have been. We also knew that the young men of the country had it in their power to determine the result of future elections. Therefore the problem confronting us was, 'What is the best method to reach these young men and encourage them to join our ranks?'

"We held many conferences, consulted many prominent party leaders, and finally concluded to take the initiative and undertake to create and establish a national association of young men's Democratic clubs.

"The result of our efforts is now history.

"For many months Congressman Sulzer and I labored together in laying the foundation for the present organization. Unassisted by some of the party leaders, who regarded the movement with suspicion or imagined it was a scheme for the 'personal aggrandizement' of its promoters, we met with little success at the start and much discouragement and some handicaps. We had confidence in the ultimate outcome of our undertaking and persistently and energetically set out to accomplish the task we imposed upon ourselves.

"Later greater and more important responsibilities and public duties were imposed upon Congressman Sulzer, and the burden of carrying forward the plans for building up young men's Democratic clubs throughout the country fell largely on my shoulders. It represents four years of incessant labor and toil, the sacrifice of time, labor, and money. However, I do not look back now with any regrets; all that I could do I have done cheerfully and willingly, because, like Congressman Sulzer, I had put 'my heart and soul into this work,' and the results have fully justified our efforts. It has long been my ambition to help elect and inaugurate a Democratic President of the United States and contribute to the election of a Democratic Congress that will aid and assist in restoring to the people popular government. This ambition is about to be realized. I have had many years of political activity, I have no political ambitions, and am content to now share with you the gratification that Democratic success must bring to every patriot. I am now ready and willing to surrender the office of president of this organization—my organization, your organization—to whomsoever you may elect to succeed me, with the earnest hope that the work which we have merely begun may be continued and go forward until the National Democratic League of Clubs shall become one of the most potential factors for the common good the world has ever known. I assure you, furthermore, that I shall always be ready and willing to render whatever service or assistance my experience or ability may enable me to give.

"I am truly gratified with the result of our four years of continuous effort. I am not unmindful of the fact that without the cooperation and support of thousands of earnest and good Democrats the country over our efforts would have been in vain.

"I am grateful for the confidence and good will that you and my fellow Democrats have accorded me and the assistance all have given the league. The National Democratic League of Clubs owes a lasting debt of gratitude to Congressmen Sulzer, of New York; RAKER, of California; and KINKEAD, of New Jersey, for their loyal, unselfish, and never-failing support, and to them, more than others, is due the credit for the effective and comprehensive campaign conducted by the National League in the recent national contest, when more than 4,000,000 pieces of literature were distributed, a systematic plan of campaign conducted by the Democratic and campaign clubs throughout the country, and thousands of young men were induced to cast their first vote for the Democratic standard bearers. I again earnestly hope that the splendid organizations which we have created will go on and that you will accord my successor the same loyal support and cooperation as was extended to me in the past.

"If I may be pardoned for imposing upon your patience and good will, I will endeavor to briefly recite the history of the National Democratic League of Clubs.

"The campaigns of 1908, 1910, 1911, and 1912 are now history.

"The next President of the United States will be a Democrat!

"The next Congress will be Democratic in both branches!

"Every Democrat in the land is rejoicing over the triumph of Democracy.

"Victories, both of war and peace, are not the result of chance; they are the results of organization, of careful planning, of thorough equipment and concert of action. The Democratic Party was victorious because it was united and organized and its opponents were divided and disorganized.

"During the past four years, day in and day out, the National Democratic League of Clubs has been conducting a continuous and persistent campaign of 'organization, education, and agitation' for the upbuilding of the Democratic Party and to increase its voting strength through unity of effort.

"Previous to the campaign of 1904, in several national campaigns the National Association of Democratic Clubs was one of the active and potential factors. With the close of the campaign of 1904 the National Association of Democratic Clubs, under the presidency of Hon. William R. Hearst, of New York, passed out of existence.

"The approach of the campaign of 1908 found the Democratic forces scattered and unorganized. At the suggestion of Congressman Sulzer, of New York, with several other gentlemen, I undertook to help reconstruct and reestablish a national federation of Democratic clubs for the purpose of rendering the party active support in the campaign of that year. After several months we succeeded in creating the nucleus for a national league of Democratic clubs.

"The campaign of 1908 was on. We asked the national party leaders to assist us in carrying forward the work which had been undertaken months before under many difficulties and amid much discouragement. The support which should have been forthcoming was withheld. We were obliged to carry on our organization and campaign unaided; moreover, we were subjected to numerous impositions and hardships by campaign managers, who shouldered upon us certain campaign work which should have been undertaken by them. Undismayed, buoyant, and hopeful, we struggled on, hoping against hope. During this campaign approximately 2,500 Democratic or Bryan and Kern campaign clubs were organized. These organizations did effective work, but as soon as the campaign was over, and the party suffered another defeat, most of the clubs disbanded and our many months of laborious effort, sacrifice, and hardship came to naught. Again our forces were scattered and divided. Democrats set about attacking and abusing one another, condemning and denouncing this person, then another. Chaos and discord prevailed. For a time it seemed as if the party was getting wider apart instead of being drawn closer together. Those were dark and gloomy days. 'It was in these dark hours, when the future looked hopeless,' that Congressman Sulzer and I conferred frequently together. We were optimistic! At each meeting we invited other Democrats to discuss with us plans for future activity. 'It took bold, daring men to lead the way where others hesitated or refused to follow.' Success came slowly. Democrats were in no mood to take the initiative or get together, take counsel, muster courage, or plan and act. However, it was finally decided to issue a call for a meeting of representatives of Democratic clubs and associations throughout the United States, to which many prominent and representative Democratic leaders were invited.

"In response to this call or invitation, signed by Congressman Sulzer and others, a meeting was held at the Raleigh Hotel, Washington, D. C., Wednesday, December 9, 1908, and steps taken to 'perpetuate' the National Democratic League of Clubs. Among those present and who participated in the deliberations of this meeting were United States Senator FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, of Nevada; Gov. HOKE SMITH, of Georgia; Gen. Floyd King, of Louisiana; Congressman William Sulzer, of New York; Congressman Elmer L. Fulton, of Oklahoma; Congressman Robert M. Wallace, of Arkansas; Col. George A. Armes, of Virginia; Capt. John S. Miller, of the District of Columbia; William S. McKean, of New Jersey; C. C. Frost, of South Dakota; Hon. W. J. Dwyar; Cotter T. Bride; Robert E. Mattingly; and Lorenzo G. Warfield, secretary, of the District of Columbia, and representatives of Democratic clubs or associations from near-by States. Letters and telegrams were received and read from Govs. John A. Johnson, of Minnesota; Robert B. Glenn, of North Carolina; John Burke, of North Dakota; CLAUDE A. SWANSON, of Virginia; Thomas R. Marshall, of Indiana; ex-Senator William A. Clark, of Montana; Senator John W. Daniel, of Virginia; ex-Gov. William L. Douglass, of Massachusetts; Hon. Roger Q. Mills, of Texas; Hon. Herman Ridder, of New York; Hon. John Mitchell, of Illinois; and other prominent Democrats, commending the work of the National Democratic League of Clubs and pledging future cooperation and support in its efforts to advance the interests of the Democratic Party. After a general discussion it was decided to take steps to place the organization on a permanent basis. After the selection of temporary officers, a committee, consisting of Congressman Sulzer, Hon. Cotter T. Bride, of Washington, and myself, were empowered to conduct the affairs of the organization and work out some plan for its future. After several months we succeeded in devising a plan which resulted in paving the way for the present organization.

"Congressman Sulzer and I bore all the expense, because we felt that we had assumed a great responsibility, had a mission to perform, and that we must not fail. From the time of the meeting at the Raleigh Hotel, in Washington, December 9, 1908 (since known as the first biennial meeting of the National Democratic League of Clubs), until April 13, 1910, when the second biennial meeting was held at Indianapolis, Ind., we succeeded in enrolling 277 organizations throughout the United States. It was with the greatest difficulty that we succeeded in enlisting these organizations, and so little interest was manifested in the movement, that scarcely more than a 'corporal's guard' responded to the call for the second biennial meeting held at Indianapolis, when the present officers were elected, and which was attended by Gov. Marshall, of Indiana; Gov. SHAFROTH, of Colorado; Senator JOHN W. KERN; ex-Gov. Joseph W. Folk, of Missouri; Col. James Hamilton Lewis, of Illinois; Congressman John J. Lentz, of Ohio; Congressman Sulzer, of New York; ex-Congressman Lafe Pence; and others.

"With the slogan, 'Organization, education, and agitation' and 'Democratic victory in 1912,' we again set out to accomplish the task before us. No effort or expense was spared to establish clubs wherever it was possible to organize them or put new life and energy into existing organizations. We resolved that this movement must succeed. In our efforts to build up the national league, Congressman Sulzer and I traveled from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast and from the Lakes to the Gulf, addressing gatherings of Democrats everywhere. During the past few years there is not a State in the country which either of us has not visited in the interest of the organization or the Democratic Party.

"It was the National Democratic League of Clubs that revived interest in the universal celebration of the birthdays of Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson. Acting under its impulse and spur hundreds of celebrations were held throughout the United States in 1910, the most conspicuous being the Jeffersonian banquet given by the Indiana Democracy at Indianapolis on Jefferson's birthday, April 13, 1910, which was addressed by Govs. Marshall, Shafroth, Folk, Congressman Sulzer, Congressman Lentz, Congressman Pence, and Col. James Hamilton Lewis. Hon. JOHN W. KERN, late candidate for Vice President of the United States, was toastmaster. This banquet is conceded to have done more to bring about unity and harmony among Indiana Democrats than any other agency. Whether or not this banquet had anything to do with the result of the election held a few months later, the fact remains that Indiana sent Hon. JOHN W. KERN to the United States Senate and elected 12 Democratic Congressmen. In fact, the 'love feasts' and Jefferson and Jackson day dinners throughout the country served to bring Democrats together and create better feeling among them so much so that our party entered upon the congressional and State campaigns of 1910 with renewed confidence, courage, and hope.

"The Democratic Representatives in Congress had 'made good' and given the people reason to trust and place confidence in the Democratic Party. The Democratic forces were better organized than before and the rank and file was united. The results of the campaign of 1910 exceeded all expectations. In nearly every State Democratic clubs had been formed or revived, and these clubs acting through the various State leagues or federations of Democratic clubs and the National Democratic League of Clubs with the regular party organizations in the several States conducted active, aggressive, and systematic campaigns and did efficient work with gratifying results to everybody. In some States there was a change of fully 40 per cent in the vote, due in many instances to the influence of these organizations, backed by thousands of young men of courage and independence; in other States the result of the election in some cases was attributed largely to their efforts. These organizations have since been recognized as potent factors and powerful influences for Democratic success in many communities.

"The work which the National Democratic League of Clubs has inaugurated now began to bear fruit and Democrats the country over began to manifest increased interest in the club movement. The following spring (1911) there were more 'love feasts,' 'reunions,' party gatherings, and 'Jeffersonian' or 'Jacksonian' birthday celebrations than the year before, and the National Democratic League of Clubs held a 'national Democratic achievement banquet' at Indianapolis, April 13, 1911, which eclipsed any similar banquet ever held by Democrats anywhere in point of attendance or enthusiasm manifested. This banquet, which was presided over by Col. James Hamilton Lewis, of Illinois, as toastmaster, was addressed by Gov. Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey; Gov. Thomas R. Marshall, of Indiana; Col. William Jennings Bryan; and other distinguished Democrats. The future President and Vice President of the United States met at this banquet for the first time, and the impression Gov. Wilson made on the Indiana Democrats at this gathering had much to do with bringing about the powerful influences that were used to induce the Indiana delegates to the Democratic national convention at Baltimore to turn to and support Gov. Wilson when the convention was 'deadlocked.'

"In the fall of 1911 the various officers and members of the National Democratic League of Clubs again aided and participated in the several State and local elections with gratifying results. Congressman Sulzer and I were confident that if the Democrats of New Mexico were given some assistance they could carry that State in the first State election. Upon the invitation of Hon. William C. McDonald, then State chairman, and Hon. H. B. FERGUSSON, we went to New Mexico and helped to elect Mr. McDonald as the first governor of the new State. If Democrats throughout the country would have responded to the urgent call for help and given but meager financial aid to defray necessary campaign expenses, to enable the party managers to perfect an organization in counties where Democrats have never had election officers, the Democrats could have perfected in a short time a good working organization that would have unquestionably changed the result of the election and given the Democrats control of the legislature and two additional United States Senators. Handicapped, as they were, without financial or other help from the outside, the Democrats of New Mexico conducted one of the most notable campaigns ever held. No one not familiar with the conditions which existed in New Mexico up to that time and a knowledge of the abuses, crimes, and intimidation which flourished under continued Republican rule and despotism has any conception of the difficulties that confronted the Democrats in their first State campaign. Under the excellent administration of Gov. McDonald, aided by other Democratic State officials, New Mexico political conditions have been revolutionized and the new State is rapidly pushing to the front. With unlimited natural resources, millions of acres of public land, and a climate unexcelled anywhere, New Mexico—the vast empire of opportunity—will surely grow in population, take front rank in the sisterhood of States, and become permanently a Democratic Commonwealth.

"In the spring of 1912 the National Democratic League of Clubs again reminded the officers of the various State leagues and federations of Democratic clubs and many unaffiliated clubs of the near approach of Jefferson's birthday and urged clubs and associations to take steps to observe the day in some 'fitting manner.' As a result there were a great many more 'love feasts' or 'Jefferson birthday' dinners or celebrations than the year before. These gatherings served to again bring members of the party together all over the country and made it possible for Democrats of all factions to forget their differences of opinion and help to bring about the final triumph which has rewarded our efforts.

"In the meantime the campaign of 'organization, education, and agitation' which had been undertaken in 1908 under such trying and uninviting conditions was being conducted in nearly every State. So, as a result of the persistent efforts of the national league and the cooperation of the various State leagues and federations, over 1,200 active, aggressive Democratic clubs and associations had been formed when the Democratic national convention met at Baltimore to name candidates for President and Vice President. This, in brief, is a recital of the history that led up to the successful organization of the National Democratic League of Clubs.

"Immediately after the Baltimore convention campaign clubs, organized primarily for campaign purposes, were formed throughout the country. Certificates of enrollment of affiliation were issued to 739 Wilson clubs or Wilson and Marshall campaign clubs, and charters were issued to many clubs which previously had not affiliated with the national or State leagues.

"The work which the permanently organized and campaign clubs did in the last campaign is well known to all, and its importance can not be overestimated. These clubs raised thousands of dollars, which were turned over to the State and National committees, and succeeded in enlisting the support and cooperation of thousands of young men who cast their first votes for the Democratic ticket.

"There is much food for thought in the results of the recent campaign.

"If the Democratic Party is to remain in power, it must first keep its platform pledges, carry out its promises, and keep faith with the people; secondly, it must continue as a united and harmonious organization.

"There is no agency which is more conducive to keeping the party together and strengthening its ranks than the social Democratic club organizations. Our party organizations and headquarters should be maintained, and the campaign of 'organization, education, and agitation' go on. It is true we have had many months of strenuous politics, but if Democrats will now take their politics in homeopathic doses regularly, allopathic doses will be unnecessary in campaign years. The organization and maintenance of Democratic clubs in every community, with limited dues to defray expenses of meeting, printing, postage, etc., is the wisest and best method by which to solidify the organization of the Democratic Party. We are united. Let us stay united and prepare for future victories and greater triumphs.

"I hope, earnestly, that the successful organizations which have been created during the past few years under such adverse circumstances, and the campaign clubs formed during the past few weeks, will not be permitted to disintegrate or disband in these hours of success and victory, but that everywhere steps will be taken promptly to make these organizations permanent institutions, even if meetings are held but once a month, or it is necessary to meet in some member's office, storeroom, workshop, or home for the purpose of strengthening and building up the Democratic Party everywhere, and give loyal and united support to President Woodrow Wilson, the Democratic Congress, and other Democrats intrusted with responsibility and the administration of Government, to the end that under Democratic rule we may keep our party pledges and continue to inspire and command the support of all patriotic Americans.

"The good that the Democratic clubs of the country have done can not be overestimated. The National Democratic League of Clubs points with pride to a record of achievement—results. The National Democratic League of Clubs is all that its name implies. To-day it is the original and only truly national organization or federation of Democratic clubs extant. Its membership embraces every State, Porto Rico, Alaska, and Hawaii. State leagues or federations of Democratic clubs have been undertaken in 28 States and the organization has been placed on a self-supporting basis, is now firmly established, and promises to continue to be a tower of strength in future campaigns."

After listening to addresses by Hon. Byron M. Clendenning, of Cincinnati, Ohio; Hon. S. C. Cox, of Virginia; Hon. Frank J. Nelson, of New York; and Dr. W. Horace Hoskins, of Pennsylvania, dwelling on the progress of the club movement in their respective States and the effective work done by club organizations in the recent campaign, upon motion of Maj. J. O. Woodward, of New York, the meeting adjourned until 10.30 a. m. Wednesday, December 4, to await the reports of the several committees.

Address of Hon. W. Horace Hoskins, of Pennsylvania.

"Dr. HOSKINS. I deem it fitting and proper, on an occasion such as this, the assembling together of the representatives of the National League of Democratic Clubs, to discuss the importance of organization.

"There is no subject so important, covering as it does the entire field of action, systematizing every phase of development, touching every achievement, combining widely diversified interests, collating, concentrating, and controlling energy by the adoption of a concise, definite method for the accomplishment of a specific purpose. It is the primal law of success.

"The organization to which our attention is directed in its nature is political, dealing with the rights of the individual, the family, the municipality, the county, the State, and the Nation in relation to their government.

"The National League of Democratic Clubs must be consistent to enjoy the confidence of the people by keeping ever in mind the universal object to be accomplished—the betterment of governmental conditions, fighting bravely, consistently, and earnestly to make this country a better place in which to live, securing life, liberty, prosperity, and property.

"That victory may result, leaders must be created and recognized; and once the work to be accomplished has been determined and the plan of action agreed upon, then every individual should contribute the necessary time and energy for the accomplishment, for indeed neglect and indifference to the duties and responsibilities of citizenship are the causes of every corrupt political condition.

"It is the solemn duty of the National League of Democratic Clubs to pledge its honor and faith to teach the duties of citizenship, so that the sacred right of suffrage may be intellectually and judicially exercised; that honesty, energy, merit, and self-sacrifice are primary influences for the betterment of civic conditions; that a grave responsibility rests upon every individual to do his whole duty, devoting the time, judgment, and intelligence necessary to solve the governmental problems that confront the country; and that the person or individual who shirks these responsibilities and duties is a moral coward, unworthy to enjoy the blessings of popular representative government.

"Long years before the Mayflower was tossed by the waves upon the rock-bound coast of New England sturdy champions of the rights of the common people were bravely fighting the battles of equality and justice, and the great corner stones of the temple of Democratic government were being bathed in the lifeblood of martyrs devoted to principle. The truest cradle of democracy was the manger of Bethlehem; the great Nazerene taught true democracy when he preached the gospel of universal brotherhood, the responsibility of the individual, and the extinction of the aristocracy; then democracy became a living sentiment, and since that time brave, true men have championed popular government, and its success is inevitable.

"Since the early beginnings of civilization two dominant forces have warred to control the governments of the world. Democracy, representing the people, demanding equality, representation, and efficiency; and its opponent, representing plutocracy, demanding a continuation of aristocracy and special privileges.

"Democracy never did and never will believe in the divine right of any chosen few to rule, or, on the other hand, believes in tyranny exercised by an uneducated multitude. It has demanded manhood, merit, efficiency, and intelligence and the obliteration of tyranny, whether exercised by a special few or by an uninformed majority, recognizing always the common good, subordinating at all times the will of the individual, but judiciously extending the scope of individual liberty to insure the triumph of popular representative government.

"The citizens of a government should mingle together, clasping hands as brothers, discussing governmental problems, and counseling together to determine a method to better civic conditions, for this is the first step in organization.

"While we should do honor to the past, our faces should be turned toward a bright future; we should recognize that progress is, has been, and will be the eternal watchword of Democracy; that progress means confidence in the people, faith, honesty, justice, integrity, belief in truth and right; unselfishly, bravely, persistently, continually, and effectively fighting for liberty, good government, and civic betterment. Such progress means success—such progress is the price of victory.

"The National League of Democratic Clubs is in a measure responsible for conditions that exist, and we must assume the responsibility, for failure on our part to scrutinize and become interested in each particular phase of activity that touches every governmental problem should forfeit the blessings of citizenship and sacred privilege of suffrage.

"It is the duty of each individual and each separate part of our organization to participate in determining which shall rule, manhood or wealth; which should lead, intelligence or corruption; who should fill representative public positions, patriotic educated freemen or the representatives of corporate wealth and aristocracy.

"The National League of Democratic Clubs recognizes that popular government must be exercised by representatives; that these representatives must be chosen through organization, therefore the responsibility of the individual member becomes greater, for only men of character, integrity, filled with patriotism, unselfish, willing to make the necessary sacrifice for liberty, with courage to preserve the rights and integrity of the Government, should be chosen as such representatives.

"Continued prosperity and advancement of the people depend upon the performance of great and important duties delegated to representatives, and those who do not hear the voice of their constituency, when the educated, judiciously expressed will of the majority has been made clear to him, is guilty of treason, and unless speedily recalled and retired to private life the Government which stands upon such representation as a basis must eventually pass into oblivion.

"The National League of Democratic Clubs should unite with other public organizations to redeem representative government, and should demand of the leaders of the Democratic Party honor and integrity, and when such leaders exercise their individual judgment they should speedily be taught that this is a representative form of government, and that as leaders they have no legal or moral right to interpose their independent judgment against the calm expression of their constituency.

"It is the greatest honor to be chosen President of the United States, to be the one man from among all the people selected as the leader and the executive head of a great representative government, and as the head and representative of all the people of this great nation he is trusted with a mighty power and charged with a grave responsibility.

"The National League of Democratic Clubs should be the first to raise its protest when the President of the United States so far forgets his dignity and honor as to become involved in State politics, or uses the Federal patronage and the dignity of his high office and his influence to control his party organization in a single State of this vast Union, and to demonstrate to him that when he has done so he has performed an unworthy act which should forfeit the respect and the confidence reposed in him by the will of the people.

"What is ambition for glory and power,
But to be reckoned the uppermost fool
Of a million of fools for a pitiful hour,
Then cursed for a tyrant or kicked for a tool.

"The National League of Democratic Clubs should protest in no uncertain terms when United States Senators grovel at the feet of the corporate and trust interests of the country and do their bidding; when the Supreme Court of the United States, ignoring their constitutional restrictions, legislate in their decisions in favor of the predatory interests of the country.

"The National League of Democratic Clubs should take a firm stand, demanding that large campaign contributions should not be made by the corporation and trust interests, and that the widest publicity possible should be given to all campaign contributions before the time of election.

"The National League of Democratic Clubs has a great duty to perform, and is to be congratulated upon the splendid, unselfish stand that it has taken in governmental conditions and for having in its rank a militant army so willing to fight with so great a devotion for Democratic principles. The organization has been unselfish in the past and firm in the belief that its membership is composed of men who believe implicitly in fighting bravely, persistently, and continuously for progress, demanding honor, integrity, and self-sacrifice from party leaders and candidates. Its influence in politics will continue to grow. As an organization it has carried the banner of true Democratic thinking against every foe when there was little hope of victory, because of devotion to the principles which were believed to be right and which would better civic governmental conditions.

"The National League of Democratic Clubs is to be congratulated for having courageously expressed its views against governmental abuse and having pointed out the unsafe course that was being pursued in the control of the present Federal Government.

"But a new era is dawning; the darkest hour has passed; from every persecution liberty has arisen; in every corrupt government honest men have joined together into compact, militant organizations for their common good. Manhood has and always will have the courage to prevail against dishonesty, and the National League of Democratic Clubs will live and have a place and influence so long as it fights valiantly with united front for the principles which protect the rights of the people.

"The solemn duty rests upon the League of Democratic Clubs to become part and parcel of the national organization of the Democratic Party. Its attitude should be to cooperate with and keep our party organization clean, honest, healthy, and strong. If there have been wounds in the past, your conduct should heal them; if there have been quarrels, you should contribute your part to eliminate the cause; and all will soon be forgotten in the present success, for to grasp the future of the Democratic Party would bewilder the imagination. East, West, North, and South, the party is united with one purpose, one principle, an honest inspiration, proud of a glorious past, sure of a successful future, with resolute purpose to meet the duties of the hour, and with an abiding faith in the integrity of the national Democratic organization. Future victory is certain.

"Your example will be followed, and the party will rise strong and healthy to meet the conditions that exist, and with enthusiasm and loyalty will sweep dishonesty and inefficiency from every branch of government.

"In this the National League of Democratic Clubs should lead the way back to the sterling democracy of Bethlehem, of the Mayflower, of Thomas Jefferson, and Andrew Jackson. It should fight valiantly for the present progressive Democracy so ably advocated for many years by that great Commoner of Nebraska, whose heart beats in sympathy with the sorrows and disappointments of the common people and upholds the policies of Woodrow Wilson.

"You have led the way in the election of a progressive Democratic President, fortified him in every position with men in sympathy with the vital principles of Democracy—men of honesty and integrity who firmly believe in the universal brotherhood of mankind.

"Your organization should continue to be the leader in assisting to take the National Government from the control of those who have in the past followed the beck and call of the trust and corporation interests, and you should do your whole duty in establishing again at Washington a Jeffersonian administration of honesty and simplicity, and when you have contributed your part to the accomplishment of this, and not until then, have you discharged the full duty you owe to your party organization.

"As the National League of Democratic Clubs takes its place in the rank of the thoroughly compact, consistent national Democratic organization, you will be welcomed, for the leaders will be confident that your organization, with its training, will be veteran soldiers, willing to endure the hardships of battle without question, following its leaders implicitly and faithfully adding your strength and enthusiasm, we will bring to it a renewed assurance of future victories."

The plan and scope committee, through its chairman, Hon. Frank J. Nelson, of New York, submitted the following report, which was adopted, and the committee discharged with a vote of thanks:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON PLAN AND SCOPE.

The plan and scope committee respectfully report and recommend:

First. That in order to meet the fixed expenses and maintain the national headquarters of the National Democratic League of Clubs a per capita tax of 10 cents per annum be assessed upon each and every member in good standing in the various leagues, federations, or organizations affiliated or federated with the national league.

Second. In order to build up the organization, increase its membership, and provide ways and means for the support and maintenance of the national league and its constituted bodies, including State leagues or federations, Territorial or insular organizations, and local clubs or associations, we recommend that the president and general secretary take immediate steps to procure a suitably engraved membership certificate or official receipt, to be sold for $1 each. That in order to augment the sale of these certificates or receipts and increase the membership of the organization the general secretary and organizer take immediate steps to place organizers in the field to secure members and organize clubs: Provided, That the proceeds from the sale of membership certificates or official receipts be distributed as follows: Fifty per cent for the use and benefit of the local club or organization, 15 per cent for the use and benefit of the State league or federation and Territorial or insular organization, 10 per cent for the use of the national league, and 25 per cent to be paid to the organizer as compensation for his time, labor, and expenses.

Third. That the offices of general secretary and general organizer be consolidated and the general secretary and organizer have full control over the organization department and be empowered to make such plans and arrangements as he may deem necessary to extend the organization and increase its membership and place it on a self-supporting basis. He shall receive a salary of at least $1,800 per annum as compensation for his services and such other remuneration as the executive board may from time to time determine.

Fourth. That in order to disseminate general information pertaining to the progress and growth of the organization and keep members of the various constituted bodies informed on matters of general interest to the membership of the National Democratic League of Clubs, the general secretary and organizer be authorized to issue from time to time an official organ or bulletin, wherein all official calls, notices, communications, etc., shall be published, and the publication thereof therein shall be official notice to all officers and members of the league. A copy of said publication shall be furnished to the secretary of each club or association; district, Territorial, or insular organization; and the president and secretary of each State league or federation free of charge.

Respectfully submitted.

The committee on resolutions, through its chairman, Judge Maynard F. Stiles, of West Virginia, submitted its report, which was also adopted, and the committee discharged with a vote of thanks.

REPORT OF RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE.

The committee on resolutions, consisting of the following gentlemen, Judge Maynard F. Stiles, of West Virginia; Lafayette Pence, Washington, D. C.; Byron M. Clendenning, Ohio; Edward Owings Towne, New York; and Herman Sirotti, New York, submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

I.

Resolved, That the National Democratic League of Clubs sends greetings and congratulations to the Democrats of the Nation, and assurances of earnest cooperation in their endeavor to translate Democratic principles into governmental action.

Resolved, That in the election of Woodrow Wilson to the Presidency we behold a recurrence to the traditional dignity, wisdom, and statesmanship of the earlier Presidents, and in the election of a Democratic Senate and House of Representatives we see a people, long exploited by privilege, deluded and disappointed by blind guides and false prophets, now turning in hope and confidence to the party of equal rights to all men in the enactment and administration of the laws for the restoration of government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

II.

Whereas we believe that eligibility of the President of the United States to reelection and the temptation resulting therefrom to use the prestige of his great office to secure continuance in power tend to lessen the independence of the President and prevent an unreserved and unselfish dedication of his abilities and energies to the public weal: Be it

Resolved, That we favor an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall make the President ineligible to a second election, and we urge Congress to adopt a resolution submitting such amendment of the Constitution to the States for ratification.

III.

Resolved, That no treaty should be entered into between the United States and the Empire of Russia unless it shall be therein provided that passports issued by the United States shall be honored and recognized by the Russian Government and that the American citizens holding such passports shall have free admission to Russia and the right of residence and trade throughout the Russian Empire, without discrimination on account of creed or race, and unless in such treaty it be provided that Russia shall recognize the principle of expatriation as it is recognized by other civilized nations.

IV.

Resolved, That we call upon the incoming administration to redeem the party pledges made in the party platform at the earliest possible moment.

V.

Resolved, That we favor a reform of our currency and banking laws for the purpose of strengthening the facilities for local credits, farming and commercial; for producing a currency more responsive to the needs of trade and thereby preventing the massing of bank reserves and resources in a few centers.

VI.

Resolved, That we are in favor of holding the inauguration ceremonies at Washington on the 4th of March as usual, and that we oppose the delaying of any part of the proceedings or an adjournment thereof to any future time.

VII.

Resolved, That we deplore the agitation for the compulsory purchase of Monticello, the former home of Thomas Jefferson, now owned by Hon. JEFFERSON M. LEVY, of New York City.

We are advised that it is the intention of Congressman LEVY to make a gift of Monticello to the Nation, and we believe that the present agitation is uncalled for, untimely, ill-advised, and unnecessary.

We therefore urge Congress to lay the whole matter upon the table and await the voluntary action of Mr. LEVY, relying upon his patriotism, his generosity, and his sense of justice and the fitness of things to do the right thing at the right time.

VIII.

Resolved, That we view with chagrin and disappointment the delay on the part of the United States Government in recognizing the new Republic of China.

We regard the action of the people of China in throwing off the shackles of centuries of oriental despotism and becoming a free and democratic people as one of the greatest achievements in the history of nations, and consider that it marks an epoch in the annals of progress, which is almost unparalleled.

That such a notable event should meet with a delayed recognition by the Government of the greatest Republic in the world is lamentable and reprehensible. We owe it to our historic position as the first and greatest modern democracy to hasten to welcome to the sisterhood of republics the new democracy of the East.

We therefore urge upon the proper officials of our Government to proceed at once in the execution of their solemn duty and hasten to recognize in a proper and official manner the new Republic as a proper tribute to the citizens of a mighty land, newly turned to the principles of democracy, progress, and self-government.

IX.

Resolved, That we sincerely deplore and condemn the manner in which a former President of the United States acquired the Panama Canal Zone and shook the "big stick" in the faces of the Central and South American Republics. We condemn as unjust, reprehensible, unbusinesslike and from every point of view a blundering and sorrowful piece of business the entire proceeding.

We find as a result of this grab that this country is losing more than $50,000,000 per annum in trade with our neighbors to the south, and that other nations are making trade connections that are likely to be permanent, to the great detriment of the people of the United States; that a feeling of ill will and hatred has been engendered that it will take many years of generous and just treatment upon our part to eradicate.

We believe that our new Democratic administration upon coming into power should and will take such action as will tend to reestablish the good feeling that existed before the rapacious and high-handed proceedings that characterized the taking of the territory of Panama from the Republic of Colombia, and show to the citizens of Central and South America that they need be under no apprehension that such conduct will be repeated, and that steps will be taken to make such reparation as will show our sincere repudiation of the methods by which the Canal Zone was acquired, and demonstrate our earnest good will and friendship to the Central and South American peoples.

X.

Resolved, That the hearty thanks of the league be tendered to Hon. William C. Liller, president; Hon. Robert J. Beatty, secretary; and Hon. Frank S. Clark, treasurer, for their earnest and efficient labors in behalf of the league and for the triumph of Democratic principles and candidates in the late election.

The duties of the officers shall be prescribed by the executive board.

ART. 11. The national president, with the advice and consent of the general executive board, shall appoint an advisory committee, which shall be composed of prominent and influential Democrats from all parts of the country, the members of this committee to have no voice in the national league unless they be duly accredited representatives. ART. 14. The general secretary and organizer shall have general supervision of the organizations composing the league, and shall, in States which have no State league or federation, be charged with the duty of organizing new clubs and county, district, and State leagues or federations wherever in his opinion advisable.

ART. 15. The national league may at any quadrennial convention create honorary presidents.

ART. 16. No person other than a member of the organization in good standing in an affiliated organization can be detailed or appointed to serve on any committees, act as a delegate to conventions, or hold any office in any local, State, Territorial, or National league.

ART. 17. All official communications, calls, notices, etc., shall be published in the official organ or bulletins of the league, and publication thereof therein shall be official notice to all officers and members of the league. A copy of said publication shall be furnished to the secretary of each club, district, State, or Territorial league or federation.

ART. 18. This constitution and by laws may be amended by a two-thirds vote of all delegates present and voting at any quadrennial convention, provided publication thereof shall be made in the official organ of the league and notice in writing of any proposed amendment shall have been given or made by the general secretary to each affiliated organization in the national league 60 days prior thereto.

The president then appointed a committee composed of Hon. William Sulzer, of New York; Hon. Byron M. Clendening, of Ohio; Hon. Lon Sanders, of Missouri; Hon. S. C. Cox, of Virginia; Hon. A. J. Welty, of Ohio; Hon. W. T. McGowin, of Alabama; and Hon. N. A. Gordon, of Oklahoma, to escort President Elect Belmont to the chairman's station.

In a few words Congressman William Sulzer, of New York, presented Mr. Belmont to the meeting. Mr. Belmont responded as follows:

Address of Hon. Perry Belmont upon assuming the presidency of the National Democratic League of Clubs.

"Mr. President, gentlemen of the convention, and fellow Democrats, I accept this great honor conferred upon me by fellow Democrats with a full appreciation of the effective work which has been accomplished by the National Democratic League of Clubs and a confident belief in its continued usefulness to our party and to our country. The aspirations of the American people are ever toward a more perfect development of democratic principles. Every American worthy of the name is in that sense, whatever may be his actual political affiliations, a democrat. We who belong to the Democratic Party and revere its traditional fidelity to constitutional principles find our duty to party and country clearly defined. Our path is straight and broad. The work of our league is already plainly laid out for us. It may be summed up as consisting of that eternal vigilance, the watchword of democracy, which is liberty itself. Let us continue to perfect our organizations throughout the country, knowing from the experience of the past that our efforts will result in rendering a service of benefit to our party. As for me, I shall be satisfied if I am able in any way to equal the good work done by our retiring president. We all regret his retirement and hope that he may be willing to give us the benefit of his aid and experience in carrying out the plans he has so ably initiated. I am truly grateful for the confidence you have placed in me, which I trust will be justified to your satisfaction."

Mr. Belmont then assumed the presidency.

There being no further business before the meeting, the convention, at 5.55 p. m., upon motion of Hon. Lafe Pence, seconded by Hon. Byron M. Clendening, adjourned sine die.

Dr. John W. Cox, of New York, who was chosen general treasurer without first being consulted, declined to serve. Upon the solicitation of President Belmont, Dr. JOHN J. KINDRED, of New York, consented to serve as general treasurer, and assumed the duties of that office.

As soon as it became known that President Belmont was a brother of August Belmont, of New York, whom Col. Bryan publicly attacked at the Baltimore convention, and associated with him in various financial and other interests, there was a general impression that the league would not continue to be in accord with progressive policies. Various affiliated organizations threatened to sever their connection with the league if Mr. Belmont continued as president. By reason of this attitude of members toward the president and his reluctance to assist in carrying forward the plans of the organization differences arose between him and other officers of the league, which resulted in Mr. Belmont enlisting the support of Mr. Lafe Pence, who was chosen as a member of the executive board in an effort to enable Mr. Belmont to exercise absolute and complete control over the affairs of the organization. Accordingly Belmont and Pence entered into a "conspiracy" to remove one of the active officers of the league if he did not turn over to them all the records, files, and other data pertaining to the organization. This demand was ignored, whereupon Mr. Belmont and Pence announced their intention to "resign," but have never done so. In the meantime Mr. Belmont sought out prominent members of the organization and, by misrepresentation and otherwise, sought to influence them to sever their association with the league, with little success.

About this time the attention of the officers of the league was directed to article 16 of the constitution and by-laws, which provides that "nonmembers" can not hold office or serve in any official capacity. A thorough examination of the records showed that Mr. Belmont and Mr. Pence did not belong to any affiliated organizations, and it was held that by reason thereof neither of them was qualified to hold office in the organization. A meeting of the executive board was called for the purpose of "organization" on Saturday, February 15, 1913, at the Raleigh Hotel, Washington, D. C. There was a full representation of officers and members of the board at this meeting, which officially declared the offices of Messrs. Belmont and Pence vacant. At this meeting Capt. Frank S. Clark, of Indianapolis, Ind., was chosen as president to succeed Mr. Belmont. Dr. JOHN J. KINDRED, acting general treasurer, informed the board that he was not a member of any affiliated club, and therefore could not legally serve. Hon. C. Arthur Haulenbeck, of Manhattan, Kans., president of the Kansas Federation of Democratic Clubs, was elected as general treasurer. Hon. HOKE SMITH, of Georgia, who had been chosen as first vice president of the league, informed the board that his "senatorial duties" made it impossible to give any time or attention to the organization and "requested" that some one else be elected vice president in his stead. Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, of California, was then elected as first vice president.

An executive committee, composed of the president, vice presidents, general secretary and organizer, general treasurer, Hon. T. J. Walsh, of Montana, Hon. F. W. Childs, of Vermont, Hon. Maynard F. Stiles, of West Virginia, Hon. B. S. Bartlow, of Ohio, and Hon. Frank J. Nelson, of New York, was chosen to have active charge over the management of the league's affairs.

* * * * * * *

At a meeting of the general executive board of the National Democratic League of Clubs held in room 483, United States House of Representatives Office Building, Washington, D. C., Wednesday, March 5, 1913, which was attended by members of the board from all parts of the country, plans of organization were considered and steps taken to carry forward an active campaign of "organization, education, and agitation." Upon motion of Hon. John J. Lentz, of Ohio, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the telegraph is in use as a part of the post-office system of nearly every civilized Government of the world except Yucatan, Honduras, and the United States; and

"Whereas in several nations of Europe the telegraph is used daily by 50 per cent or more of the people, while in the United States its use is so expensive as to be prohibitive to 99 per cent of our people and in daily use by less than 1 per cent; and

"Whereas only 25,000 centers of our population have access to the system now owned and operated by the trust; and

"Whereas there are 35,000 centers of population having post offices, but no telegraphic communication with the world; and

"Whereas it was estimated by Prof. Frank Parsons, of Boston, that the telegraph could be installed in all of our 60,000 post offices at a cost of $50,000,000 and messages of 30 words could be transmitted regardless of distance at a cost of 10 cents each: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the National Democratic League of Clubs, advocate and promote in every way possible the immediate improvement of our postal service by the installation of the most modern telegraphic instruments in every post office, and that this our Republic and the hundred millions of our population be liberated from the Telegraph Trust and our people be given all the blessings of electrical science in our educational, commercial, and social communications."

The officers of the organization were authorized to immediately inaugurate and conduct a suitable campaign to mold public opinion and use all lawful methods to help bring about the enactment of a Federal law for the establishment of a governmental postal-telegraph system.

The undersigned auditing committee, to whom were exhibited the records, books, accounts, warrants, vouchers, and receipts of the president, secretary, and general treasurer of the National Democratic League of Clubs, embodied in the above and foregoing consolidated financial report, respectfully represent that we have carefully and diligently examined and audited the records submitted and find them to compare in every respect and to be accurate in detail.

We highly commend the treasurer, Hon. Frank S. Clark, for the efficient, painstaking, and excellent manner in which the financial records of the league have been kept.

The committee wishes to direct special attention to the fact that no record or account was kept by the president, Hon. William C. Liller, of his expenses for railroad fare, hotel, etc., incurred in traveling about the country in the interest of the organization during his term of office. The committee ascertained that on several occasions, when no funds were available or the league received no financial assistance, the president raised funds by personal notes, which were later paid by him, in order that the organization might be kept alive and the work which the league had inaugurated and undertaken might be advanced.

We therefore recommend that the league extend a vote of thanks to the president for his patriotic, unselfish, and loyal service, and that as a testimonial of its appreciation the various officers of the league and members of affiliated organizations be memorialized to contribute to a fund to procure a suitably engraved "loving cup" or other testimonial in appreciation of the valuable services rendered the National Democratic League of Clubs and the Democratic Party by Hon. William C. Liller.

Respectfully submitted.

GEORGE W. MESSNER,
CHARLES A. TURNER,
M. M. MAHONEY,
Auditing Committee.

THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC LEAGUE OF CLUBS.

WHAT IT IS AND WHAT IT IS TRYING TO ACCOMPLISH.

The National Democratic League of Clubs is engaging actively in the work of adding to the Democratic vote in the Nation. Its labors are purely a party work, aiming simply at the increase of Democratic strength. The league exists as a vote-getting auxiliary of the regular Democratic organizations, and its success depends upon the hearty cooperation of Democrats throughout the country.

It is essential to the business and social development of our Nation that Democratic principles be upheld. Thorough and vigorous organization is of the first importance for victories at the polls. It is the aim and endeavor of the National Democratic League of Clubs to aid in this work of organization and to help the regular organizations to achieve greater success. Victories, both of war and peace, are not the result of chance—they are the result of organization, of careful planning, of thorough equipment and concert of action.

The league is a union or federation of Democratic clubs and associations in all parts of the country. It is now in its fifth consecutive year of activity. Its management is intrusted to an executive board composed of some of the foremost Democrats in the party, who take an active interest in its success and welfare.

The National Democratic League of Clubs is not organized for the purpose of either advocating or opposing any Democrat before he shall have been chosen by the constituted bodies or of furthering the interests of any man or set of men before being indorsed by the party but for the attainment and preservation of unity, the upbuilding of the party, and the promotion of its principles and welfare. Nor is it intended that any club or the league of clubs shall usurp the functions of the several State, county, or district committees, but work in harmony and in cooperation with them.

The national league already includes substantially all the representative Democratic club organizations throughout the country, and it is our aim to organize additional clubs wherever they can be formed to advantage. Enrollment blanks may be had upon application to the headquarters of the league at Indianapolis, Ind., or Washington, D. C., or the chairman or secretary of any State league or federation of Democratic clubs, free of charge.

Charters will be issued to all organized clubs upon the application of the president or secretary of such club. There is no possible interference with local independence and method in campaign work.

The national and various State leagues or federations of Democratic clubs, working in harmony with the Democratic national, State, and county committees, desire to urge upon all Democrats the great and lasting good that might result from such an organization, and to ask your earnest cooperation in aiding and furthering the establishment of Democratic clubs throughout the country.

The National Democratic League of Clubs aims, among other things—

To make loyal Democrats of young men who are about to cast their first votes;

To explain clearly to the foreign-born voters the practical helpfulness and patriotic purposes of the Democratic Party, and to enlist the new-made citizen in its ranks, thus making them good Democrats and therefore better Americans;

To confirm in the wavering an inclination toward Democracy and to make a habit of party fealty;

To preach early and late, day in and day out, the politics of Jefferson and Jackson;

To enlist voters, regardless of previous party affiliations, in the cause of Democracy, by every honorable means;

To use its friendly offices to discourage, as far as possible, strife or factional differences within the party and use its great influence to promote and bring about harmony and unity of effort.

These are the purposes and ambitions of the National Democratic League of Clubs and the various affiliated State leagues and federations of clubs, and to become the vote-getting auxiliary of the Democratic Party is its practical aim. It seeks to make votes, not candidates for office.

Its policy is constructive, not destructive, using its great influence to build up instead of to tear down. It is no decoy for the Republicans but a tower of strength to the Democrats.

It is a source of undisguised satisfaction to Democrats generally that this large and representative body of Democrats intends to remain active, both before and after as well as during the campaigns of 1914 and 1916, and that the regular party organizations will have the benefit of its support and cooperation. While the league desires intensely Democratic success, it does not welcome victory at the sacrifice of party principles or the public interest.

The hearty cooperation of all Democrats is earnestly invoked toward extending the power and influence of the league and the formation of clubs wherever there are none. If your club is not affiliated with the State or National league then use your influence toward that end. If there are no clubs in your locality then help organize. Do it now!

INDORSEMENTS.

Gov. John F. Shafroth, Colorado:

"I appreciate to the fullest measure the good, beneficial, and effective work the National Democratic League of Clubs has done and is doing. The zealous, unselfish, and disinterested support and cooperation of the men who compose it means more for the party than almost any other kind of support. Our party is truly fortunate at this time in having able and loyal Democrats to work for it in the spirit that the National Democratic League has shown from time to time in the past.

"Nothing is more essential to party success than unity of effort and action, and no agency is more conducive to bring about this condition than the Democratic club organization.

"The efforts of the league, directed as they are to interesting the young men who are about to cast their first vote and enlisting them in the cause of Democracy, can not be overestimated. The importance of the aggressive volunteer work which the league is doing is beyond question."

Hon. William Jennings Bryan:

"I believe in the club. The club is a Democratic institution. Back in the days of Jefferson the political club was employed as a means of propagating political truths.

"There is nothing that increases a man's interest in the party's success more than the work that he himself does. When a man joins a club and enrolls himself as a worker his own enthusiasm is increased. The consciousness that he is serving the party is in itself a stimulus to greater service. Then, too, the club gives a unity of purpose and of action. When men meet together in the clubroom and exchange views they are not only better informed upon the questions which are being discussed, but they concentrate their efforts and work more effectively.

"The most valuable contribution that a Democrat makes to his party is in the service that he renders by cooperation with other Democrats. The larger the clubs the better the impression made; the larger the club the greater the amount of work done; the larger the club the more enthusiasm.

"And I am satisfied that if the Democrats will join these clubs and, having joined, will help circulate literature, help raise the campaign fund, help get out the vote, and help to secure the count of the vote the members will be so pleased with what they have done, so satisfied with their work, that when the 4th of March comes they will feel that they are justified in going to Washington to see the consummation of their hope and prayers."

Hon. Granville Jones, South Dakota:

"There is nothing that appeals to me, in a political way, more than this organized effort to band together the Democrats of the Nation, especially the young men, for organized work. There never was a time when men knew so little or cared so little for the fundamental principles on which this Government was founded. For 40 years we have been running on a theory of government exactly contrary to that held by all great statesmen of all parties in the Nation. Under this theory the vast resources of our country are being rapidly garnered into the hands of a few men, comparatively, who are the favorites of national legislation. Whatever may be our theory of equal rights, as a matter of fact the day of equal opportunities is passing. If the young men of America could be led to understand that the continuation of the present system would close every avenue of distinction to the young man without means it would rally the youth of the country under the banners of Democracy. Therefore, the work undertaken by the National League of Democratic Clubs is of far-reaching importance and certain to redound to the welfare of the party."

Ex-Gov. Newton C. Blanchard (and late justice of the supreme court), Louisiana:

"The National Democratic League of Clubs should receive the unqualified indorsement and approval of all Democrats. Democratic victory will come as the result of organizations such as that of the league of clubs and the work they will do.

Ex-Gov. John A. Johnson, Minnesota (1909):

"I assume that it will be superfluous for me to express my hearty sympathy with this movement and to assure you of my desire to cooperate with every consistent effort to strengthen and extend the work of the National Democratic League of Clubs. In recent campaigns there has been lack of organization in the Democratic Party and unity of organization in Republican ranks."

(In union is strength.)

ORGANIZATION STRENGTHENS THE INDIVIDUAL.

The National Democratic League of Clubs is a union or federation of Democratic clubs and associations, organized for the attainment and preservation of unity, the upbuilding of the Democratic Party, and the promotion of its principles and welfare.

It fosters education. Establishes fraternity. Discourages selfishness. Reduces prejudices. Creates rights. Abolishes wrongs. Improves conditions. Helps to make the world better.

Every citizen of the United States, regardless of former political affiliation, who believes in the principles of Democracy as taught by Thomas Jefferson, advocated by Andrew Jackson, and enunciated by Woodrow Wilson is eligible to membership and should become a member. The progress and influence of the league is only limited by those who hold aloof.

Get together, encourage, organize, educate, agitate, and affiliate.

Don't wait until to-morrow; to-morrow never comes.

Don't wait or depend on some one else to undertake the formation of a Democratic club or association in your locality; start it yourself.

Don't hearken to the indifferent; wake them up.

Don't think it impossible; one of the greatest military leaders of the world contended there was no such word as "fail."

Don't weaken; persistence always wins.

Don't wait to be drafted. Around the bivouac fire the soldier who enlisted at the first call for volunteers is more respected than the fellow who waited to be drafted.

Be a charter member.

Detailed information, application blanks, and other literature will be cheerfully furnished upon request.

WHY DEMOCRATIC CLUBS, SOCIETIES, OR ASSOCIATIONS SHOULD BE A PART OF THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC LEAGUE OF CLUBS.

The principles of the Democratic Party of the United States of America are expressed in the National Democratic League of Clubs, and all local organizations, district and State leagues or federations should be in touch with the national desire and demand. Organizations, like individuals, will achieve the greatest results only through cooperation and unity of effort. In union is strength. In division there is weakness.

A link in the chain of communication—fellowship and solidarity is welded by such connection. Its seal certifies the genuineness of purpose, attests its worth, entitles respectful hearing, and commands recognition. Unity is fostered and advanced.

A bond of this kind helps to keep the party free from spurious and rival organizations, inspired for selfish reasons, which might scatter the forces of Democracy.

A combination of thought is the mother of combined action. Exchange of thought must precede combination. A chartered club or association is in the exchange channel. It writes and questions, receives and reads, and profits by the tests and experiences, the gains and losses, of its comrades.

A larger field is thus within the reach of all. Prompt and concerted action can be secured. Unity is extended and its power increased. Obnoxious or favorable legislation can be retarded or advanced. Organized effort can be used more effectively and the general interests of Democracy furthered.

A rudderless ship is akin to an organization without a charter. There is no recognized law to guide it, no directing hand to move it. It may sail smoothly for a brief time in fair winds, but at the critical moment it is at the mercy of the elements. Wise organizations get together.

Why we are growing: We have no salaried officers receiving pay for doing nothing; no one gets paid unless he earns it, and then only a reasonable compensation; none of the national officers receive any compensation except the general secretary and organizer. Our per capita tax does not exceed 10 cents per member per year. Every subordinate organization has full charge of or control over its own finances and local matters. There is no interference with local independence and method in campaign work.

The National Democratic League of Clubs furnishes every member of an affiliated organization with an official membership certificate, which entitles the holder upon presentation of his membership card to any affiliated organization anywhere to the usual fraternal courtesies. There are over 1,200 clubs and organizations throughout the country; many of these have either their own clubhouses or splendidly furnished headquarters, so that members of affiliated clubs can often find a place to visit and become acquainted while away from home, meet with persons of their own political faith, exchange thought and knowledge of political methods.

HOW TO FORM A DISTRICT OR STATE LEAGUE.

Let the organizer, or any local club, send a communication to all bona fide clubs or organizations requesting that three or more representatives be appointed or elected to participate in a meeting, giving time and place. Effect a temporary organization, hold a general discussion, and appoint an organizing committee to visit all clubs failing to respond and encourage them to join in forming the league or federation. Then hold other meetings until permanent organization can be effected. For further instructions address the general organizer, National Democratic League of Clubs, Washington, D. C., or Indianapolis, Ind.

HOW TO ORGANIZE A DEMOCRATIC CLUB OR ASSOCIATION.

Familiarize yourself with the inclosed literature. If you are convinced that the aims and objects of the organization are commendable and worthy of encouragement, then undertake the formation of a club or association in your locality. Undertake it with enthusiasm and determination to succeed—"nothing succeeds like success."

If you believe that some name other than your own would lend more weight with local members, get that name at the head of the list if possible. If you don't succeed, try others and go ahead—perseverance tells in the end.

Bear in mind that it requires 10 members to form a club and procure a charter. You can have as many more as you like—a hundred or a thousand—the more the better.

There are a number of ways to procure them. One is by personal solicitation, one at a time; the other is by calling a meeting and inviting all eligible to membership to attend. Then explain the objects and purposes of the organization, and enroll members and procure signatures to the application for charter.

Endeavor to make your organization a credit to its organizers, "sacrifice personal prejudices to expediency," and you will succeed. This will demonstrate itself more forcibly when you select your officers. Do not encourage factional strife, but rather endeavor to eliminate it by creating a spirit of harmony and good-fellowship.

No organization can be successfully effected without expense, and a small proportion must be borne by each member. By exacting a membership fee in accordance with its own requirements, clubs will be able to make their organization self-supporting and have funds in the treasury to meet all its fixed expenses. Each club should be at all times self-governing as to local matters.

After you have enrolled at least 10 members and secured a sufficient number of signatures to the application for a charter, select a name by which your organization will be known or designated from others, as Jefferson Club, Jackson Democratic Association, Young Men's Democratic Society, Progressive Democratic League, First Ward Democratic Club, Old Hickory Club, Monticello Association, Jackson County Democratic Association, Burlington Democratic Club, etc. Then forward application with required enrollment fee to the president of your State league or federation, who will approve the application and forward to national headquarters. If no State league or federation has been established in your State, then mail the application and fees direct to the general secretary of the national league, who will make proper record of same and present it to the national president for final action and approval. The organization department will then detail some one to formally organize the club and install your officers, preferably the organizer who formed the club, or some one from the State league headquarters, to be designated by the president of the State league or federation, or requested by the organization itself. This can be made a public affair, prominent Democratic speakers invited to make addresses, and other methods of entertainment provided to create public interest and enthuse the members. Your charter will be delivered by the organizer or instituting officers, or mailed direct from national headquarters in blank, so that the names of all the members can be engrossed thereon in space provided for that purpose. Each club determines who shall be its charter members. Clubs often hold their charter list open for some time to encourage an increase in membership. If the space for engrossing names of charter members is left vacant, clubs can have the names of such members as it may elect engrossed therein.

Organizers will keep in touch with affiliated or federated organizations, supervise them, and whenever possible or requested to do so assist, by counsel or otherwise, in promoting the best interests of the association by suggesting methods for the conduct of your club, and provide entertainment for the members, and keep alive interest and enthusiasm. National and State headquarters will also supplement from time to time information and suggestions which may be useful and beneficial.

Organization throughout the country is now being conducted with vim and vigor, and hundreds of members and many new clubs are constantly being added. "Priority of organization will in future years be a matter of legitimate pride," so do not delay, but "get busy" at once. Be the first one to start this movement in your locality.

If you desire any information other than given herein, kindly write to the general secretary and organizer, National Democratic League of Clubs, Washington, D. C., or Indianapolis, Ind. All inquiries will be cheerfully answered if accompanied by stamp for reply.

PLAN OF CAMPAIGN TO BE CONDUCTED BY DEMOCRATIC CLUBS.

The campaign committee of the National Democratic League of Clubs submits the accompanying program of proposed work as suggested to the various clubs of the league, and hopes that so far as possible the plan will be carried out by all the clubs, in order that there may be harmony and unity of effort. The committee realizes, however, that owing to the different character and circumstances of different clubs a certain amount of venture in the effort to be undertaken will be necessary. Clubs should endeavor to work in harmony at all times with the regular party organizations in order that there may be no conflict in campaign work but unity of effort and cooperation all along the line. The local situation and the character, strength, and activeness of the local Democratic organization must also determine the work of each club. Where the local organization is strong, efficient, and reliable, the club will naturally not duplicate the ordinary machinery of campaign work, and will seek to find the most important field for successful effort, which the regular organization is not likely to undertake. Where, however, the regular organization is weak and the club is strong, as is the case in many places, it is earnestly hoped that the club will supplement the work of the regular organization by thorough and efficient attention to the minute details of campaign work. In all cases it would seem that effort might be made to secure a complete poll of all voters, to find out and influence doubtful voters, particularly those independent voters who might not be easily influenced by appeal of the regular organization, and to see that these voters find their way to the polls on election day—that is, provided the effort made previous to election day is thought to have produced an attitude of mind favorable to the Democratic ticket.

The program of work then takes into consideration the condition and character of our individual clubs, the political situation with which the club must deal, and the condition and character of other local organizations.

OUTLINE OF PROPOSED WORK FOR CLUBS AFFILIATED WITH THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC LEAGUE OF CLUBS.

First. Each club will certainly appoint a campaign committee, composed, as far as possible, of those who have had campaign experience and who are able and willing to give a certain amount of work during the campaign.

Second. Such campaign committee will be divided into subcommittees in accordance with the work to be undertaken by the club. Among others, the following committees will naturally be appointed: Press and literature, finance, poll or registration, first voters, canvass, watchers, election-day workers.

Where the time which members can give is limited, it will be found necessary to subdivide the work, even at the cost of some deficiency, in order that the whole field of effort may be covered.

Where, however, a club is so fortunate as to secure a few capable workers who can give considerable time during the campaign the duties of two or more of the committees suggested will doubtless be combined under one committee.

To economize and further promote efficiency a small executive committee of the campaign committee may wisely be organized, which shall be in touch with all the subcommittees of the campaign committee. If the subcommittees are large it will probably be found desirable either to organize subcommittees of these committees with more or less general power to act, or to place such power in the hands of the chairman of such subcommittees.

Without suggesting in detail the work of the different committees, since the detail sufficiently indicates the general character of their work, the committee ventures to offer suggestions relating to the work of one or two of the proposed committees.

To the committee on press and literature your committee urges caution in the publication of special campaign documents. We believe that money is often wasted on literature which is either not used or produces no effect. In the desire to form new and original documents the time of such committees is too often taken in the preparation of documents and the discussion of their contents, with the result that little time is given to their distribution.

We believe that from now on the committee on press and literature should regard as its greatest responsibility the placing of well-selected literature in the hands of voters likely to read the documents distributed. One good document, carefully and thoroughly distributed, is worth half a dozen documents which some ambitious writer may think will have a peculiar influence over the local situation.

Let it constantly be borne in mind that our appeal is to the intelligence and broad-minded interest of the people in their State and country's welfare.

WATCHERS, FIRST VOTERS, AND WORKERS' COMMITTEES.

It should be constantly borne in mind that while the distribution of literature and enthusiastic Democratic meetings, addressed by able and earnest speakers, are valuable contributions to a successful campaign, by far the most important work is the reaching of the individual voter who will not attend public meetings and is not likely to read our campaign literature. Other things being equal, the party which makes the most thorough canvass of voters by capable workers will certainly win, and the contribution which the clubs of the league can make to the efficiency of this work, while it may be weak in ostentation, is of the greatest value.

The campaign committee, therefore, urgently recommends that the committee of each individual club, having such a canvass of voters, should be composed of experienced, energetic workers, who are willing and able to give time to the canvass, and we further urge that whatever work may be undertaken by each club, direct effort shall be made to reach voters in their homes.

The recommendations of the committee are therefore as follows:

First. Organization of appropriate campaign committees.

Second. Special attention to new voters and to the poll or registration of voters.

Third. The reaching of as many independent voters as possible, and the placing in their hands of carefully selected campaign literature as a supplement of earnest personal appeal.

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS,
NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC LEAGUE OF CLUBS,
Washington.

DEAR SIR: "Nothing succeeds like success!"

The Democratic Party succeeded in the last campaign because it was organized and united and the Republicans were divided and disorganized.

Hon. William F. McCombs, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, in addressing the national committee at Washington, March 5, 1913, sounded the keynote of success and spoke with wisdom when he said:

"I don't believe after an election or an attempted election of President a committee should be dormant until a few months before another election. I believe we should be in thorough cooperation all of the time. I don't myself know how to get along without organization. My mind runs in those channels. With reference to the organization which we now have, I think we have the best fighting body of Democrats in this country. If you had not been, you would not be here.

"Fortunately, during the past few years I have very thoroughly systematized the work which is now before us. I believe that in order to assure a continuation of what we have accomplished we have got to be an organized army, and unless we do organize as an army we are going to meet an organized army on the other side, and there may be danger.

"It would be a great delight to me to carry on this work as far as I can. It will be a great delight to me to receive suggestions and advice from the members of this committee. Two years from now, when we are going to meet strong opposition, we can maintain ourselves in Congress and can organize ourselves for the great battle four years from now."

The National Democratic League of Clubs is in hearty accord with all that Chairman McCombs says. For the past five years it has been continuously and persistently advocating "organization."

We have never believed in inactivity during intervals between campaigns. In our opinion it is essential that every county and State committee should maintain headquarters, keep up their organization, and continually strengthen the membership of the Democratic Party wherever possible to do so. In the furtherance of this plan the league advocates the organization and cooperation of Democratic clubs in every county in the United States and urges frequent meetings for the purpose of keeping alive interest and enthusiasm. If there is no club in your county, will you not assist in its organization or encourage others to do so and help us prepare for the congressional and State elections of 1914 and the general election of 1916? If you are not a member of the league, we will be glad to enroll you if you will return the inclosed enrollment blank with membership fee of $1.

We need your support and cooperation.

Will you help?

Faithfully, yours,

WILLIAM C. LILLER,
General Secretary and Organizer.

ORGANIZATION DEPARTMENT,
NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC LEAGUE OF CLUBS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND FELLOW DEMOCRATS: In 1908 Gov. John A. Johnson, of Minnesota, said: "Democratic defeat is due to lack of organization in the Democratic Party, and Republican success to unity of organization in Republican ranks."

In the campaign of 1910 and the last national campaign the Democrats were organized and united; the Republicans were divided and disorganized. Democratic clubs were organized everywhere. These clubs, acting with the various State leagues and federations of clubs and the National Democratic League of Clubs, conducted systematic campaigns and did much effective work with notable results.

You know what has been accomplished. It demonstrates what can be done through organized and united effort.

The National Democratic League of Clubs and the federated State leagues invite you and all the progressive men and women of the country to join its ranks now. The league is practically a young man's organization. It especially appeals to them to enlist in the movement and it relies on them to help carry forward its plans.

If your club or organization is not affiliated with your State league or federation or the National Democratic League of Clubs, then this is an invitation for you to join. There is no interference with local independence or method in campaign work. Each club is self-governing. By identifying yourselves with the State or National leagues you do not surrender your identity or waive any of the rights or privileges you now enjoy. Each club is free to conduct its organization in its own way at all times. In addition, it enjoys the distinction of being a part of a great national organization of clubs, enabling its members to visit and receive fraternal courtesies from other similar organizations in other parts of the country; to exchange ideas and methods of club organization and campaign work, making it possible for your club to do better and more effective work in future campaigns; and serves to promote friendly relations among Democrats everywhere and unify the party ranks, insuring party victory. Please bring this matter before your club or organization at its next meeting; have your secretary write the names and addresses of your members on the inclosed application for charter blank and forward same to us at an early date. Do it now!

If there is no club in your locality, call a meeting of Democrats at your office, home, workshop, or some public place and take steps to organize one. Invite every Democrat to attend. Do not put this off or wait on some one else to do it. Do not grow discouraged if you do not meet with success at the beginning. Persistence always wins. Get busy, and show the Democrats in your locality that you are wide-awake, enterprising, progressive, and in harmony with the policies of the Democratic administration. Let us organize a compact organization in every county of the United States and put none but "progressives" on guard or in places of trust and responsibility.

If you are in accord with these plans I shall expect to hear from you favorably and soon, either that your organization has joined the league or that you will undertake to form a club in the near future.

Faithfully, yours,

WILLIAM C. LILLER,
General Secretary and Organizer.

NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC LEAGUE OF CLUBS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY AND GENERAL ORGANIZER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND FELLOW DEMOCRAT: We have your letter of recent date and are pleased to learn of your interest in our movement. The inclosed circular letter, "Plan of organization," outlines our plan for the recruiting of 1,000,000 members and the formation of Democratic clubs in every county in the United States.

The educational value of these clubs is self-evident and, we believe, ample incentive for the support of all progressive Democrats who are in favor of progressive legislation and popular government.

We are now securing the cooperation of a large corps of reliable and enthusiastic members, organizers, to visit offices, workshops, business houses, factories, and residences in their respective communities in their spare time and presenting the league's message to progressive Democrats everywhere and enlisting them as members and then organizing them into local clubs as outlined in the organization plan.

Membership is divided into two classes—(1) active members and (2) associate members. Active members are those who take an active part in the affairs of the league and the club organizations; associate members are those who are interested in the success of the movement and willing to help it along but who can not take an active or aggressive part in the work. Active members pay an enrollment or membership fee of $1, which entitles them to a copy of the official receipt-membership certificate, a copy of the official organ of the league for one year, and such literature as may be issued by the league from time to time. Associate members pay an enrollment or membership fee of 25 cents and receive only the official receipt-membership certificate. There are no other dues, fees, or assessments for the use and benefit of the national league except the annual per capita tax, which does not exceed 10 cents per annum. Both active and associate members pay the annual per capita tax. The per capita tax for the first year is included in the enrollment or membership fee. Each club should be self-governing as to local matters and will have its own fixed expenses, therefore it is suggested that clubs fix their own local membership dues in accordance with their own requirements.

The enrollment fees for both active and associate members are nominal, and you should have no difficulty in organizing a club of 10 active and 10 associate members to start with and quickly increase the number of each class to at least 100. We allow organizers a commission of 25 per cent on all enrollments secured by them and on the annual per capita tax so long as they continue in the capacity of organizer, supervise the clubs organized by them, and keep interest alive among them and collect and forward to us the annual per capita tax each year.

One club of 100 active members and 100 associate members would net you $31.25 at the beginning and $5 annually thereafter. If you organized 50 clubs with an average of 50 active members or 10 clubs of 250 active members—and you ought to be able to do much better—you would earn $625 as organizer's fees or commissions on enrollments, not counting the fees or commission you would receive from enrolling associate members. In some localities, especially in the formation of county organizations, it is possible to organize clubs of over 1,000 members in a very short time and make anywhere from $200 to $250 in commissions. In organizing county-club organizations you will have little trouble in enlisting the service and cooperation of zealous Democrats who will be glad and willing to help build up a large influential organization.

Aside from the financial remuneration which organizers receive, the work is pleasant, educational, agreeable, and highly beneficial to those who have political ambitions or desire to hold political office by reason of the acquaintances and friendships formed. There is no more dignified occupation, and the movement is one that should appeal to the patriotic instincts of every American who believes in the principles of the Democratic Party and the rule of the people.

Some of our national party leaders regard this as the greatest constructive movement ever known in American politics and predict the league will soon become one of the most effective organizations in the country. You should be proud to be identified with such an undertaking.

We have several applications for your territory, and if you are capable of undertaking the enrollment of members and the formation of clubs and will engage in this work at once we shall be pleased to hear from you promptly before assigning the field to another applicant.

We shall always be glad to receive suggestions which will facilitate the work of the league or the cause in which it is engaged and will appreciate the cooperation of all who are in accord with our plans.

Upon receipt of your application for enrollment, with membership fee, we will send you organizer's contract, commission, official receipt-membership certificate, enrollment blanks, and other literature so you can go ahead and organize.

Faithfully, yours,

WILLIAM C. LILLER,
General Organizer.

PLAN OF ORGANIZATION OF THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC LEAGUE OF CLUBS.

With the inauguration of President Woodrow Wilson our country enters upon a new era in the administration of governmental affairs. Democratic control, after many years of Republican misrule and extravagance, imposes vast opportunities for the enactment of constructive legislation and efficient, economical administration of government for the betterment of conditions affecting the public weal. Many pitfalls confront us. A divided opposition party with two factions eager to gain vantage ground, stands ready to criticize, censure, condemn, and misrepresent every act.

Our party was intrusted with power and responsibility by reason of the general belief that we would enact progressive policies into law. So long as the Democratic Party holds to the cause of human rights and human welfare as against privilege and protection, and sticks to its determination to apply its platform, its enthusiasm and vitality and standing in the Nation will increase. You can not stop a party with a great purpose. As long as high resolve controls it the Democratic Party will infallibly advance and grow in strength and membership. When it deserts its high calling its life will ebb away. There is imminent danger of standing discredited before the Nation if we violate our platform pledges and promises. We can not expect to remain long in power if we are false to our trust.

President Wilson is confronted with grave responsibilities which will put his patriotism, his courage, his knowledge, and his wisdom to the supreme test. The tariff, the trust, and the banking and currency problems are questions, among others, respecting which the great combinations of capital and special privilege will seek to control. There are men in Congress who have been conspicuous opponents of legislation designed solely for the public good. So, in this crisis, it is essential that progressives everywhere should unite and stand shoulder to shoulder in support of the Democratic administration's determination to free business and industry from the ever-tightening grasp of privilege. "There can be no compromise which will leave privilege as strongly intrenched as ever."

In every village, hamlet, and town men and women should come together and renew their plighted troth, reaffirm their faith, organize and band themselves together in support of the administration so that all through the Union they may carry to the people the message of justice and liberty which inspired us in the last election. It is only in such times as these that, reckoning little of the cost and without hope of early reward, men and women perform signal patriotic service to their country.

The National Democratic League of Clubs contends that the Democratic Party is to-day, and always has been, the progressive party of America.

The National Democratic League of Clubs is an organization of men around fundamental issues and not an organization of men around a man. Its purpose is the development of the sovereignty of the composite citizen. And while the membership of the league is confined to those who believe the Democratic Party, represented by progressive Democrats, offers the most encouragement for the establishment of these principles, there is no intent to make it a political organization in the sense of promoting the political fortunes of any man or set of men. No man is greater than his party.

The objects of the National Democratic League of Clubs are: To advocate, promote, and maintain the principles of Democracy as proclaimed by the national Democratic Party; to create a more widespread interest in progressive legislation and popular government; to encourage and promote the enactment of laws (1) for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people; (2) direct primaries for the nomination of all elective officials; (3) thoroughgoing corrupt practices acts that shall tend toward safeguarding the purity of the ballot box; (4) amendments to State constitutions providing for the initiative and referendum; (5) direct election of delegates to national conventions with opportunity for voters to express their first and second choice for President and Vice President; to procure members of the league in every State, Territory, and insular possession of the United States; to keep such members in close touch with questions of politics and statecraft by means of periodical publications or otherwise; to publish and disseminate printed matter; to contribute and expend for campaign purposes such moneys as may be in the treasury of the league and available for such contribution and expenditure; and to perform such work as may best conserve the interests of the Democratic Party.

One of the primary objects of the National Democratic League of Clubs is to conduct what might be termed a continuous educational campaign through publicity; that is, to keep the voters throughout the country in closer relation to one another; to assist in the perpetuation of Democratic principles by conveying to the people, in a comprehensive manner, through the medium of its official organ and the cooperation of the Democratic press the true meaning of the measures advocated by President Wilson and the National Democratic Party, and to educate the voter more thoroughly as to the great part played by Democracy in the progress and prosperity of the Nation.

TO BE SELF-SUPPORTING.

The league shall be self-supporting and be maintained through its membership dues. The object of this is to preserve the Democratic character of the league and to avoid the danger that it may become, or be thought to be, an agency for the promotion of any individual who may furnish financial backing. No contributions will be solicited or received from corporations or men who are known to be identified with special interests. The league shall remain absolutely free from predatory influences.

Membership is divided into two classes, (1) active and (2) associate members. The initiation or enrollment fee for (1) active members shall be $1, which shall entitle the member to an official receipt-membership certificate, a copy of the official organ of the league for one year, and such other literature as may be issued by the league from time to time. The membership fee for (2) associate members shall be 25 cents, which shall entitle the member to an official receipt-membership certificate. Active members of the league who pay an enrollment fee of $1 make it possible for the league to conduct its educational and publicity work and keep its members in touch with the conditions that exist in the party. There are no other dues, fees, or assessments for the use or benefit of the national league except an annual per capita tax of not more than 10 cents, which shall be collected by the treasurer of each club and forwarded to national headquarters for the support of the movement, expenses of headquarters, printing, postage, clerical hire, etc.

The league proposes to stand firmly by the Wilson administration and those progressive Democrats who have been intrusted with power and responsibility in their determination to carry out the pledges and promises made to the people. By "Wilson administration" we mean not the President only, but the Congress—all branches of the Government.

We feel that during the present Democratic administration clubs can de effective work in helping to keep Democrats together and unite our forces in support of President Wilson's policies, as well as assist in the organization of progressive Democrats in every county and congressional district throughout the country for the purpose of nominating county, congressional, and State tickets for the election of 1914 and waging effective campaigns. Victories, both of war and peace, are not the result of chance; they are the result of organization, of careful planning, of thorough equipment, and concert of action. It would be unfortunate if we should be confronted with a divided Democratic or opposition Congress in the midst of President Wilson's term. Therefore it is manifest that the clubs have an important mission to perform and merit the support and encouragement of all progressive Democrats who are interested in the success of the Democratic national and State administrations, the future welfare of the Democratic Party, and the common weal.

In the furtherance of these plans the National Democratic League of Clubs is conducting an active, aggressive campaign of education and organization, education along progressive Democratic lines and organization of the forces that realize the necessity of concerted action to uphold the policies of the Democratic Party and support the administration of Woodrow Wilson.

To make this campaign successful, the National Democratic League of Clubs needs the assistance of 1,000,000 earnest workers pledged to carry out these plans. We aim to enroll at least 1,000,000 volunteers. This can easily be done if every member now enrolled will at once endeavor to recruit 10 others, and each of them 10 others, and so on. In this way the influence of the league will be quickly extended throughout every community. We are, therefore, depending on your hearty cooperation, and expect you to extend the influence of the league among your friends and acquaintances and get every progressive Democrat lined up on the right side of this great movement.

As soon as you have recruited or enrolled 10 members we want you to organize a club for the purpose of perfecting a permanent organization of the members in your locality. The only requirements of this club are that all members shall first be enrolled as members of the league and be so recorded at headquarters; that at least four officers shall be duly elected, viz, president, vice president, secretary, and treasurer; and that each club shall arrange for a meeting to be held at least once a month. Each club shall be self-governing as to local matters. Its purpose shall be, first of all, to extend the influence of the league by recruiting or enrolling other members, and in every way possible endeavor (1) by education and (2) organized effort to put into execution the plans of the organization. Each club, in addition to these main purposes, shall be at liberty to interest itself in other lines of effort and activity that will further the welfare of the Democratic Party and promote good, honest, efficient, and popular government. Each club will fix its own local membership dues in accordance with its own requirements. Each club is requested to make a written report to headquarters of the work done by it, at least once every six months, through its president or secretary.

That the league may prove to be the potent factor that is predicted for it, it is necessary that its membership should rapidly increase to substantial proportions. We believe that it is possible to enroll 1,000,000 members within the next year, and to this end your cooperation is earnestly requested.

We need your help and assistance in this movement now. We expect you to take the lead in your locality. It is your fight—our fight. We must have your loyal support and united effort in striving to bring about the desired results.

Don't wait to be drafted! Around the bivouac fire the soldier who enlisted at the first call for volunteers is more respected than the fellow who waited to be drafted! Be a charter member! Join the 1,000,000 club to-day! Be a leader!

We propose to stand by the administration and help put none but "progressives" on guard! Will you help? If so, begin now!

DEMOCRATS, STAND BY THE ADMINISTRATION—THE VOLUNTEER ARMY OF ONE MILLION CLUB.

In its organization campaign the National Democratic League of Clubs has undertaken to recruit or enlist 1,000,000 progressive Democrats and their friends, old and young, in the volunteer army of one million.

Every post office in America should become a recruiting station, and Democrats in every county should assist in the organization of at least one central or county-wide organization and plan for regular monthly meetings of an inspiring character. These county-club organizations can have an executive committee composed of a progressive Democrat from each election district or precinct in the county or be made the nucleus for a number of smaller or subsidiary clubs or organizations in each district or precinct and officered by progressive Democrats resident therein. Special efforts should be made to establish a Democratic club in every county seat in the United States.

Upon receipt of your application for enrollment with membership fee, additional blanks and necessary literature for the organization of a club will be forwarded promptly. The funds received from membership enrollments are employed to help carry forward the campaign of organization and education, pay for the maintenance of headquarters, printing, postage, clerical hire, etc., which requires a great deal of money.

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS,
NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC LEAGUE OF CLUBS,
Washington.

To the Associated Democratic Clubs and all Democratic Organizations:

Last year many celebrations of Jefferson's birthday were held throughout the country, and they were so uniformly successful and resulted in such great good to the party that it is with pleasure the National Democratic League of Clubs again calls attention to the fact that April 13 is approaching, and urges that the custom be continued this year, and that every Democratic club in the country hold a suitable celebration. After many years of continuous effort and successive defeat, it is only fitting and proper that Democrats should meet together to rejoice over and celebrate the victory for Democratic principles. This is a splendid time to create additional interest in the Democratic Party, hold reunions, and arouse enthusiasm among the rank and file.

It is recommended that each club proceed immediately to appoint a committee to make arrangements for a dinner, public meeting, or other suitable form of celebration, and advise us at once as to the time and place it is to be held. On account of the large number of celebrations which were held last year, it was found impracticable to hold them all on the 13th of April, owing to inability to secure enough speakers to go around, and it is therefore suggested that arrangements be made for dates between that time and May 1. These headquarters and the various State League or Federation headquarters will endeavor to assist local committees as far as possible, and, if desired, will secure one or more speakers for each club, if requests are made promptly and accompanied by full particulars as to the character or nature of the celebration.

In cases where interest in clubs has waned, we would suggest that this is a good time to revive them, and to effect reorganization where such course is necessary. Our party organizations should be maintained and the campaign of education go on. It is true, we have had many months of strenuous politics, but if Democrats will take their politics in homeopathic doses regularly, allopathic doses will be unnecessary in campaign years. The organization and maintenance of Democratic clubs in every county in the United States, with limited dues to defray expenses of meetings, printing, etc., is the wisest and best method by which to solidify the organization of the Democratic Party. Therefore we earnestly advocate that the numerous successful organizations which have been created during the recent campaign will not be permitted to disintegrate or disband, but that everywhere steps be taken to make these organizations permanent associations, even if meetings are held but once each month, or it is necessary to meet in some member's office, storeroom, workshop, or residence for the purpose of strengthening and building up the Democratic Party throughout the country and give loyal and united support to President Wilson and other Democrats intrusted with responsibility and the administration of government, to the end that under Democratic rule we may keep our party pledges and promises and inspire the confidence and support of all patriotic citizens. It is suggested that where there are no clubs this is a good time to organize them.

A number of successful celebrations were held last year under the auspices of county committees and county or district leagues of clubs, and we would suggest that in localities where this plan is most feasible the same plan be pursued this year. Kindly advise the general secretary as soon as possible of any action taken by your organization, to the end that the fullest possible cooperation may be accorded. If your club or league is not now affiliated with the State League or Federation or the National League of Democratic Clubs, we would recommend early action along these lines.

Frequent club and public meetings serve to keep alive interest and enthusiasm and tend to strengthen and unify the party ranks. A united, active, and aggressive Democracy will insure Democratic success in 1914 and 1916. We request that you keep us posted on the action of your organization and will appreciate your sending us, from time to time, marked copies of newspapers containing notices of celebrations, public meetings, etc. This information is often of interest and benefit to clubs in other parts of the country. In union is strength. Let us get together and stand united by the administration.

NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC LEAGUE OF CLUBS,
Washington.

DEAR SIR: Your name has been suggested as a member of the National Democratic League of Clubs, and it gives me great pleasure to write and inclose you an enrollment blank.

Our league is pledged to support progressive Democratic policies and uphold the Wilson administration. It is now engaged in an effort to create and unite public sentiment in favor of the establishment of a givernmental postal-telegraph system, that will embrace every post office in the United States and our insular possessions. The latter is not purely a party movement, but one that should appeal to every public-spirited citizen who desires to help bring about great reforms and correct flagrant abuses from monopolistic control.

Knowing you to be a patriotic and public-spirited citizen, it will be a pleasure for us to enroll you as a member of the league, and I am sure that your influence and aid will be of great value to us and that you will enjoy being kept fully informed through our official publications of the progress being made.

A postal-telegraph system under Government control and operation is a vital need. Statisticians tell us that it will be possible to send messages from one part of the country to the other, regardless of distance, at the rate of 30 words for 10 cents. Don't you believe this reform is worth striving for?

If you do not care to join the league or assist in furthering this movement, will you kindly let me know?

Sincerely, yours,

WILLIAM C. LILLER,
General Secretary and Organizer.

MAKE EVERY POST OFFICE A GOVERNMENTAL TELEGRAPH STATION.

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS
NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC LEAGUE OF CLUBS,
Washington.

To the Associated Democratic Clubs of the United States and all public-spirited Americans who favor the enactment of a Federal law for the establishment of a governmental postal-telegraph system:

The National Democratic League of Clubs has inaugurated a campaign of "organization, education, and agitation" for the establishment of a governmental postal-telegraph system that will embrace every post office in the United States and our insular possessions.

This movement will be resisted by the Telegraph Trust and its powerful allies—the beneficiaries of special privilege. In order to make our campaign successful and effective we must have the united support and cooperation of every member of the league and all their friends and acquaintances. We must organize the forces that realize the necessity of concert of action to accomplish results, carry on an educational campaign along practical lines to educate and convince the public of the practicability and possibilities of the governmental telegraph system, and agitate prompt and effective action by Congress to emphasize the urgent need of this great reform.

The inclosed circular letter will give you some facts that will not only interest you but astonish thousands of intelligent persons. We will be glad to have you bring these facts to the attention of the members of your organization as well as your friends and have them join you in adopting resolutions and getting up petitions to Congress urging the early enactment of a law for the establishment of a governmental telegraph system.

At the next meeting of your organization please endeavor to have resolutions adopted urging Congress to take action along these lines. Have these resolutions printed in your local newspapers, send a copy to your United States Senators and Representatives in Congress, then get up a petition addressed to the President and Congress of the United States urging favorable action looking to the establishment of a governmental telegraph system in connection with our postal service. Get as many persons as you can, regardless of political affiliation, to sign these petitions, and then when you have them freely signed forward then to Hon. John J. Lentz, chairman legislative committee, National Democratic League of Clubs, Washington, D. C., to be presented collectively.

We urge early action.

May we anticipate your cooperation and support in the furtherance of this great reform?

Faithfully, yours,

WILLIAM C. LILLER,
General Secretary and Organizer.

Write your United States Senators and Representatives at Washington and tell them you are in favor of this reform and want to see a Federal law enacted to put this plan into operation. Get as many of your friends as you can to write similar letters.

MAKE EVERY POST OFFICE A GOVERNMENT TELEGRAPH STATION.

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS,
NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC LEAGUE OF CLUBS,
Washington.

Will you help establish a governmental postal-telegraph system?

Nearly every civilized Government in the world except Yucatan, Honduras, and the United States uses the telegraph as a part of their postal system.

In European countries over 50 per cent of the population utilizes the telegraph service daily, while in the United States less than 1 per cent of our people employ this method of rapid communication.

In other countries the telegraph is controlled by the Government. In the United States the telegraph system is owned and controlled by a trust which makes telegraphic communication so expensive as to be almost prohibitive.

Just as the Express Trust opposed and delayed the enactment of parcel-post laws, so has the Telegraph Trust thwarted and prevented the enactment of Federal laws that will install the telegraph in every post office in the United States and our insular possessions.

No movement, however extensive in its ramifications, can succeed unless it has a specific object in view or is actuated by a motive championing the cause of human rights and human welfare as against privilege and protection.

The Democratic Party was intrusted with power and responsibility by reason of its pledge to enact progressive policies into law. In keeping with its determination to support and uphold the Wilson administration and help it "make good" and "do things," the National Democratic League of Clubs has undertaken to conduct an active and aggressive campaign of "organization, education, and agitation," and will strive in every way to promote the immediate improvement of our postal service by the installation of the most modern telegraphic instruments in every post office and liberate our one hundred millions of people from the grasp of the Telegraph Trust and give them all the blessings of electrical science in our educational, industrial, commercial, and social communications.

Statisticians compute that the installation of modern telegraphic instruments and appliances in our 60,000 post offices will not cost in excess of $50,000,000 and that it will be possible to transmit messages of 30 words each from one part of the country to another for 10 cents per message.

It is therefore manifest that the establishment of a governmental postal-telegraph system will prove to be an even greater postal reform than the parcel post and the greatest achievement of the Wilson administration if enacted into law by it.

This movement in the furtherance of the greatest constructive reform ever undertaken by any organization is one that should appeal to every patriotic American. Although promoted by Democrats, because the Democratic Party is in power and pledged to enact progressive legislation, no broad or liberal minded citizen can afford to oppose or withhold his support from this undertaking. This movement should appeal to and merit the support of every American, regardless of party affiliation.

To make this campaign successful, we must conduct an effective and systematic campaign. If you are in sympathy with the league's efforts, we shall be glad to have you enroll as a member, assist in the organization of clubs, the distribution of literature, and help in other ways to carry forward the campaign inaugurated to further this great reform.

We shall be glad to receive suggestions which will facilitate the work of the league or the cause in which it is engaged and will appreciate the cooperation and support of all who are in accord with our plans.

Will you help? If so, let us hear from you promptly. Now is the time for action.

Faithfully, yours,

WILLIAM C. LILLER,
General Secretary and Organizer.

We invoke the aid, support, and cooperation of all patriotic, commercial, legislative, civic, fraternal, and other organizations in the advocacy of this reform.

We will appreciate your bringing this matter before your organization at its next meeting and urge it to take official action by passing resolutions in favor of the establishment of a governmental postal-telegraph system.

The following form of resolutions is respectfully submitted for your convenience:

"Resolutions.

"Whereas nearly every civilized Government in the world, except Yucatan, Honduras, and the United States, uses the telegraph as a part of their postal system; and

"Whereas in European countries over 50 per cent of the population use the telegraph service daily, while in the United States less than 1 per cent of our people employ this method of rapid communication; and

"Whereas in other countries the telegraph is controlled by the Government, while in the United States the telegraph system is owned and operated by a trust which makes telegraphic communications so expensive as to be almost prohibitive; and

"Whereas experts and statisticians compute that modern telegraphic instruments can be installed in all of our 60,000 post offices for $50,000,000 and messages of 30 words can be transmitted, regardless of distance, at a cost of 10 cents each: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we urge and request that such action be taken by the President and Congress of the United States as will insure the immediate improvement of our postal service by the installation of the most modern telegraphic instruments or devices in all post offices and bring about governmental control and operation of our telegraph system. Be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and the public press."

After your organization has adopted suitable resolutions and forwarded copies of same to the President of the United States, your Senators and Representatives in Congress, it is suggested that you have as many of your members as will write your Senators and Representatives at Washington and tell them you (they) are in favor of this reform and want to see a Federal law enacted to put this plan into operation.

Do it now.

No. ——.

A PATRIOTIC APPEAL.

To the President and Congress of the United States:

Your petitioners, citizens of the United States of America, respectfully represent—

That the telegraph is in use as a part of the post-office system of nearly all civilized Governments of the world except Yucatan, Honduras, and the United States.

That in several nations of Europe the telegraph is used daily by 50 per cent or more of the people, while in the United States its use is so expensive as to be prohibitive to 99 per cent of our people and in daily use by less than 1 per cent.

That only 25,000 centers of our population have access to the system now owned and operated by the trust.

That there are 35,000 centers of population having post offices, but no telegraphic communication with the world.

That it is estimated the telegraph can be installed in all of our 60,000 post offices at a cost of $50,000,000, and messages of 30 words can be transmitted, regardless of distance, at a cost of 10 cents each.

Therefore your petitioners respectfully request that such action be taken as will insure the immediate improvement of our postal service by the installation of the most modern telegraphic instruments and appliances in every post office, and that this our Republic and the hundred millions of our population be liberated from the Telegraph Trust, and our people be given all the blessings of electrical science in their educational, commercial, industrial, and social communications.

Wherefore we will ever pray, etc.

——— ———.

It is hoped the whole American people, men and women, without distinction, sect, or party, will sign this petition. Copies will be sent to all governors of States, mayors of cities, members of patriotic, legislative, commercial, civic, fraternal, and other bodies for signature or legislative action. Editors and public journals, it is especially hoped, will aid in creating public sentiment in favor of this reform and otherwise assist in furthering the object set forth in this petition.

To those who favor this reform and who would serve this cause no better way could be found than to sign this petition and induce others to do so.

Let every person put his or her name on record, as they ought, among those who aided in bringing about one of the greatest constructive reforms.

We call urgently upon all patriotic citizens to unite in support of this movement.

Let everyone sign this petition.

This petition, which is numbered and registered, is sent to ——— ——— for the purpose of securing signatures for the furtherance of this movement.

A CALL FOR VOLUNTEERS.

Wanted: An army of a million—not a million men armed with rifles, but a million men armed with the determination to wage a campaign for Democratic principles. That is the army to be recruited, and that is the campaign to be waged if success is to be won in the congressional and State elections of 1914 and the national campaign of 1916. It must be a campaign of education and organization—education along Democratic lines and organization of the forces that realize the necessity of concerted action against the selfish interests that have so long dominated political affairs. Do you want to enlist in this army of a million volunteers and do your part in the great work? The National Democratic League of Clubs is now waging a campaign of organization, education, and agitation. We aim to make it one of the most comprehensive educational-publicity campaigns ever undertaken for the upbuilding of the Democratic Party. To make this campaign successful the National Democratic League of Clubs needs the assistance of 1,000,000 earnest workers. We want and must have your cooperation and support.

Will you enlist? Will you become a recruiting officer, trying to enlist others? Will you help organize this army of a million to wage a strong and winning battle for the triumph of Democratic principles? Victories, both of war and peace, are not the results of chance; they are the results of organization, of careful planning, of thorough equipment, and of concerted action.

The lines for the campaign of 1916 have been formed. The skirmishers have been ordered forward. As they advance let the work of organization be pushed, to the end that when the battle opens the forces of Democracy may be prepared for a general advance, well organized, well planned, and well equipped.

A million earnest men are needed to take hold and help in this great campaign. If you will be one, prevail upon as many others as you can to enlist.

Cut off, sign, and return the enrollment blank below for your own membership. Or, better still, send in a request asking for a number of enrollment blanks and they will be forwarded promptly, enabling you to give your acquaintances an opportunity to join in the work of building up the "army of a million volunteers" and to secure copies of the official publications of the league and other interesting and instructive literature from time to time.

THE CAMPAIGN IS NOW ON!

STAND BY THE ADMINISTRATION! PUT NONE BUT "PROGRESSIVES" ON GUARD!

The National Democratic League of Clubs campaign of organization, education, and agitation is again under way. Everywhere new clubs are being formed, old clubs are being reorganized and strengthened by the addition of new members. What part are you taking in this great movement? We need you and every progressive Democrat to help us in the work we have undertaken. If you do not belong to any Democratic club, join one. If there is no club in your locality, help to organize one. In unity is strength.

You and every other Democrat should be interested in this great movement and know how the campaign is progressing. It is our intention to keep you posted through the official organ of the league, Progressive Democracy. Progressive Democracy will contain news of interest to all Democrats, report the proceedings of Congress and action of the Wilson administration, the progress of the league's campaign, reprint speeches and publish interesting and instructive articles on timely subjects by prominent Democratic governors, United States Senators, Congressmen, and others. Its policy will be constructive, not destructive—using its influence to build up instead of to tear down. Clean thinking, honest counsels, the best harvest of sound minds will characterize its editorial utterances. It will be a thoroughly Democratic paper for men, women, and the home.

We want to place copies of Progressive Democracy in the hands of every American voter. We want you, your friends, and their friends to read it and subscribe for it. We want Republicans and Progressives, as well as Democrats, to read it, because we believe that we can interest them also in the progressive policies advocated by the Wilson administration and the Democratic Party. We believe that your friends will be glad to assist us in increasing the circulation of Progressive Democracy and widening its scope and influence. The greater its circulation the greater its power for good.

To this end we ask that you send us your subscription to Progressive Democracy for one or more years at 50 cents per year. In clubs of five or more the subscription rate is 25 cents. Get up a club and send us as many subscriptions as you can. Do it now!

We will appreciate your sending us any news items that you may have affecting the interest and welfare of the party or which may be of interest to Democrats in other parts of the country. We are especially anxious to learn of the success of progressive policies everywhere. Write and tell us what your club or the Democrats in your locality are doing. We want a correspondent from every club.

AN ADDRESS TO YOUNG MEN.

[By Hon. William C. Liller, president of the National Democratic League of Clubs, to the Federated Democratic Clubs of the United States, November 4, 1912.]

Fifty or even twenty-five years ago any young man of fair ability, integrity, and energy had a reasonable chance of becoming a somebody in the community. He could be an employer and make himself a factor in the busy life of the times.

It was an era of small capital, small stores, small business, but big ambition. It was the time when men, even though obscure and with little capital, could, by exercising frugality and taking advantage of opportunities or making them when occasion demanded, be absolutely certain of attaining position and a competence if not actual wealth.

WHEN YOUNG MEN AMOUNTED TO SOMETHING.

Those were the stirring times when the might and intelligence of a united people were working out the great problem of a marvelous country's growth. We were then a business nation formed of countless individuals, each filling a niche and each adding his quota of brain and brawn.

The average man who, by energy and economy, had saved a few dollars was able to start in business for himself. Young men always had this incentive. They knew they had an equal chance with their fellow men, and it was this feeling of security in the future that laid the foundation of this great country, which, young, healthy, and virile itself, was eminently a young man's country.

EVERYTHING WITHIN HIS GRASP.

No avenue of business endeavor was closed to him. The markets of the world, the realms of finance, the technical fields of manufacturing and railroading, and the allied forces of civilization were open to those who would enter them.

To sum it up, the young man of a few years ago was master of himself and his destinies, and was guaranteed by the very condition of the country and the trend of the times that absolute and well-defined equality held out to all by our Constitution.

WHAT DO YOU AMOUNT TO NOW?

Where do you, the young man of to-day, find yourself? Stop and consider if you are not in this exact position: Even if, in your youth and thoughtlessness, you have not given much attention to great social problems, you can not fail to have noticed a growing, insidious, and apparently irresistible force that has changed the aspect of the commercial, financial, and manufacturing business of the country. You have seen all the small concerns that have been the backbone of American industry swallowed up in a whirlpool.

And to-day you must see that, as things are now drifting, there is no hope for you in the future. By no chance can you ever cope with that great, heartless, strong, relentless factor that is grinding out the stamina, the hope, and the ambition of every young man in America to-day. There is no use in your trying to save money and start in business for yourself under present conditions. The business world is closed to you.

THE EVIL TO YOUNG MEN.

All this, of course, has reference to trusts, combinations, and monopolies, but please remember that the trust is not a great big glittering generality. It is a cold fact, borne out by figures, and is as surely an element warring against the material and personal welfare of the young man and his family as anarchy itself. Think of it—over 1,000,000 persons thrown out of employment by the formation of new trusts during the past few years, thereby adding to the already colossal wealth of the trusts billions of dollars. But remember, also, that the remedy is in your own hands and that you have in your power a sure, direct, and deadly weapon in the form of a vote.

Are you a clerk in the employ of the meat or rubber trust? If so, are you not perfectly aware that there is no reason under God's blue heaven why you should try to better your position or look forward to a career that means anything but drudgery and a bare living? Why should the meat or rubber trust pay you one dollar more than it does, when it knows there are plenty of others to take your place because the labor market is glutted with strong American manhood forced into idleness by these gigantic, illegal combinations?

GOD HELP YOU.

Are you employed by the Steel Trust, the Harvester Trust, the Tobacco Trust, the Paper Trust, the Tinplate Trust, the Shipbuilding Trust, the Woolen Trust, the Coal Trust, the Lumber Trust, the Smelting Trust, the Oil Trust, the Telegraph and Telephone Trust, the Steamship Trust, the Money Trust, or any of the numerous trusts? If so, God help you, for you know, and the whole Nation knows, that you are but a cog in a great, throbbing, merciless machine that grinds out the lifeblood of the young men of our country, so that a few individuals may indulge in luxuries and gradually but surely form an offensive aristocracy.

Can you for a moment be undecided as to which of the parties has made possible the conception of the trusts, their continuance and growing power? Are you unable to fix the responsibility for this situation?

THOSE RESPONSIBLE FOR THE EVIL.

J. Pierpont Morgan and George W. Perkins, two of the wealthiest, shrewdest, and cleverest men of America, are the embodiment of the trust idea. Hon. William Jennings Bryan, the great American commoner, in a recent address, referring to Mr. Morgan and Mr. Perkins, said that it was their syndicate, "the syndicate that organized the Steel Trust and collected as compensation for organizing a conspiracy against 90,000,000 people the enormous sum of $67,000,000, which is more than one-sixth enough to build the Panama Canal," and that they were the chief figures in the Steel Trust, which was "the only corporation that ever scared a President of the United States." For it was Morgan and Perkins's corporation that went to Mr. Roosevelt in the midst of the 1907 panic and frightened him into permitting the absorption of its largest rival, the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. No one can now successfully deny this; and neither Mr. Morgan nor Mr. Perkins, in their indifference and supreme contempt for the workingman, will take the trouble to do so.

When, therefore, men like Morgan and Perkins, shrewd, far-seeing, calculating, and experienced to a degree, insist that a continuance of the present "prosperous state of affairs" is possible only by the election of Mr. Taft or Theodore Roosevelt (under whose administration more trusts were born or created and fostered than any other), is it not a direct acknowledgment that both Taft and Roosevelt, standing as they do for Morgan and Perkins, stand also for what their masters represent—trusts and more of them?

CLOSES DOOR OF OPPORTUNITY.

Gov. Marshall, of Indiana, recently said:

"The greatest objection to the trust is that it closes the door of opportunity on the young man. To this statement the answer is made that there are $10,000, $20,000, and $30,000 jobs awaiting men of these grades, and I suspect this statement is true; but what of it?

"Suppose I could make $10,000 a year as manager of a trust, but suppose my happiness would be promoted by managing a little business of my own out of which I might not make even $3,000. And suppose—what is true—that I should be prevented by the trusts from running my little business and should be broken up if I tried to run it. Have I not then been deprived of the one thing in life that this republic ought to give a man—his chance to be happy?

COGS IN INDUSTRIAL SYSTEM.

"If this continues there will be great captains of finance and industry who will wade through slaughter to a throne and shut the gates of mercy on mankind. They will take the young man of to-day and crush out every little bit of personal ambition which these young men have and make of them only cogs in a great industrial system, and our boasted democracy where men were free will cease to exist save in name.

"Too long have we contemplated great riches as the source of happiness. Contentment is the great thing for a people, and no people can be content whose men may not engage in any business that they choose which is not immoral in its character, and many a man is happier in the failure of his own plans than he would be in the success of a system."

THE "FREE-TRADE" BUGABOO.

The Republicans are now placing great stress upon the absurd allegation that Democratic triumph means "free trade" and the destruction of American industry and labor. Do you know that the trusts and combinations of great corporations that make use of manual labor in its original form and not of a mechanical character are the only interests in America who enjoy the benefits of absolute free trade? Actual "free trade" is now enjoyed by those who receive the benefits of the highest tariff. The steel, beef, wool, and other trusts write their own tariffs. They loudly proclaim their purpose to be the "protection of American labor from the pauper labor of Europe." Then they import the pauper labor of Europe, pay it "jungle" prices as against the price of American labor, and receive the full benefit of both the high tariff and the difference between American high-priced labor and the "pauper labor of Europe" that they import, in violation of law, and employ. If you doubt this, go among the laborers of the trusts and see the diversity of languages and the miserable conditions under which they live.

THE ISSUE IS PLAIN.

Young man, do not let yourself be fooled by the opponents of Woodrow Wilson and the Democratic Party, who, in their frantic endeavor to hide the real danger of the trusts, are trying to raise false alarms. They will tell you that a return to Democratic principles means panic, disaster, destruction of great industries, manufacturing, agricultural and otherwise, and countless other things that in themselves become important only because the shouters are red faced and hysterical in their efforts to get away from the main issue and mislead or confuse the electorate.

LEARN THE FACTS.

This is not intended for a political argument in the usual sense of the term. The intention is not to destroy or attack other parties, nor to praise Democrats. It is my intention, however, to let every young man in America know what the trusts have been and are doing to him, and what they will continue to do to him if he does not make use of the tremendous power in his hands and prepare to crush out a national evil that, if not checked at once and for all time, will make us a Nation of autocrats and serfs.

THINK IT OVER.

Think this over carefully. It is plain matter-of-fact common sense. It is true, and you know it. You can not do yourself, the cause of the country, a better service than by submitting this statement to a friend, be he Democrat, Republican, Progressive, or Socialist. For the trust is no respecter of parties, and strikes alike the young and old of whatever creed or faction.

YOUNG MEN WAKING UP.

It is because the young men of the country are beginning to realize the true condition of affairs that thousands of young men of courage and independence are breaking away from old party traditions and alliances and joining the Democratic Party, because the Democratic platform appeals to their sense of right, to their sense of fair play and justice, to their sense of responsibility, and to their own judgment as to the solemn duties of the State and Nation toward great wrongs and existing evils which obtrude themselves in the social and industrial life of America to-day.

YOUR VOTE IS THE NATION'S REMEDY.

In the language of that great scholar, student, and statesman, Gov. Woodrow Wilson:

"The whole atmosphere of government, under Republican rule, has become an atmosphere of patronage, of governmental favor or hostility. Patronage is the mother of graft; favor breeds servility. The trusts control. Controlling markets, they control supply; controlling supply, they control price; controlling price, they control life. They control also employment. Who has now the full traditional American freedom of opportunity? What are you free to choose when you seek an independent opening in life, except either to serve a trust or defy it? And who, under our present laws, has the strength to defy it?

"This, then, is your choice: Will you act with those who have created this system and who can not honorably extricate themselves from it, or will you act with those who mean slowly, steadily, persistently to change it and draw the country forward to a better, a freer system; a system of more open opportunity, in which the Government will accord no patronage and in which the law will make men as individuals responsible again?"

Are you convinced? Then remember, your vote is the Nation's remedy. A vote for the Democratic standard bearers means a vote for popular government and equal opportunity for all.

Eight Hour Day for Women Employed in the District of Columbia.

OF

HON. ANDREW J. PETERS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, March 1, 1913.

On the bill (H. R. 27281) to regulate the hours of employment and safeguard the health of females employed in the District of Columbia in any mill, factory, manufacturing or mechanical establishment, or workshop, laundry, bakery, printing, clothing, dressmaking, or millinery establishment, mercantile establishment, store, hotel, restaurant, office, or where any goods are sold or distributed, or by any express or transportation company, or in the transmission or distribution of telegraph or telephone messages or merchandise.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to and urge the earliest possible consideration for H. R. 27281, a bill to safeguard the health and limit the hours of employment of women in the District of Columbia.

I shall first read you the bill in full, together with a brief explanation, paragraph by paragraph, giving the different States where similar provisions are already in effect.

A bill (H. R. 27281) to regulate the hours of employment and safeguard the health of females employed in the District of Columbia in any mill, factory, manufacturing or mechanical establishment, or workshop, laundry, bakery, printing, clothing, dressmaking, or millinery establishment, mercantile establishment, store, hotel, restaurant, office, or where any goods are sold or distributed, or by any express or transportation company, or in the transmission or distribution of telegraph or telephone messages or merchandise.

Be it enacted, etc., That no female shall be employed or permitted to work in any mill, factory, manufacturing or mechanical establishment, or workshop, including among others any laundry, bakery, printing, clothing, dressmaking, or millinery establishment, store, hotel, restaurant, office, or where any goods are sold or distributed, or by any express or transportation company, or in the transmission or distribution of telegraph or telephone messages or merchandise, more than 8 hours in any one day or more than 6 days or more than 48 hours in any one week.

The limitation of hours to 8 in one day and 48 in one week follows the statutes of California (Stat. of 1911, act 1537) and Washington (Acts of 1911, ch. 37). The number of occupations covered in this section is somewhat larger than that in the statutes quoted above, but no industry or occupation is included which is not included in some State laws. There is also an eight-hour law for women in Colorado.

SEC. 2. That no female under 18 years of age shall be employed or permitted to work in or in connection with any of the establishments or occupations named in section 1 of this act before the hour of 7 o'clock in the morning or after the hour of 6 o'clock in the evening of any one day.

The night work of girls up to 18 years is prohibited in 12 States, with slight variations in the terminal hours. These States are: Arizona, California, Indiana (include all adult women employed in manufacturing), Louisiana, Massachusetts (include all adult women employed in manufacture), Michigan, Mississippi, Nebraska (include all adult women employed in factories, stores, hotels, and restaurants), Ohio, Oklahoma, New York (include girls up to 21 years in factories and stores), Pennsylvania.

SEC. 3. That where a female is employed in the same day or week by more than one concern or employer in any establishment or occupation named in section 1 of this act, the total time of employment must not exceed that allowed per day or week in a single establishment or occupation. It shall be the duty of the employer to make diligent inquiry as to such previous or other employment of such female employee elsewhere, and as to the hours of such employment. Any person who shall require or permit a female to work between the hours of 6 o'clock in the evening or 7 o'clock in the morning in violation of the provisions of this section shall be liable for a violation thereof, and the employment of such female employee in excess of the total time of employment permitted by law shall be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to be with knowledge of such violation.

This section is in effect in New York regarding employment in factories and stores (C. L., ch. 31, Art. VI, par. 77, subdiv. 6); also in Massachusetts (act of 1912, ch. 477).

SEC. 4. That no female shall be employed or permitted to work for more than six hours continuously at one time in any establishment or occupation named in section 1 of this act in which three or more such females are employed without an interval of at least three-quarters of an hour, except that such female may be so employed for not more than six and one-half hours continuously at one time if such employment ends not later than half past 1 o'clock in the afternoon and if she is then dismissed for the remainder of the day.

This provision was first enacted and is now in effect in Massachusetts. (R. L. 106, par. 37.)

It is also in effect, with slight modifications, in other States, such as New York (same statute as above, sec. 89) and Maryland. (Acts of 1912, ch. 79.)

SEC. 5. That every employer shall post and keep posted in a conspicuous place in every room in any establishment or occupation named in section 1 of this act in which any females are employed a printed notice stating the number of hours such females are required or permitted to work on each day of the week, the hours of beginning and stopping such work, and the hours of beginning and ending the recess allowed for meals. The printed form of such notice shall be furnished by the inspectors authorized by this act. The employment of any such female for a longer time in any day than that stated in the printed notice shall be deemed a violation of the provisions of this section. The presence of any such female on the premises at any other hours than those stated in the printed notice shall constitute prima facie evidence of a violation of this section. Where the nature of the business makes it impracticable to fix the recess allowed for meals at the same time for all females employed, the inspectors authorized to enforce this act may issue a permit dispensing with the posting of the hours when the recess allowed for meals begins and ends, and requiring only the posting of the total number of hours which females are required or permitted to work on each day of the week and the hours of beginning and stopping such work. Such permit shall be kept by such employer upon such premises and exhibited to all inspectors authorized to enforce this act.

The provision which requires the posting of a printed notice stating the hours of labor required each day is necessary for enforcement and is required in all effective laws.

SEC. 6. That every employer shall keep a time book or record for every female employed in any establishment or occupation named in section 1 of this act, stating the number of hours worked by her on each day of the week, the hours of beginning and stopping such work, and the hours of beginning and ending the recess allowed for meals. Such time book or record shall be open at all reasonable hours to the inspection of the officials authorized to enforce this act. Any employer who fails to keep such record as required by this section, or makes any false statement therein, or refuses to exhibit such time book or record, or makes any false statement to an official authorized to enforce this act in reply to any question put in carrying out the provisions of this act shall be liable for a violation thereof.

This section follows the Illinois act regulating women's hours of labor (act of 1911). It has been found an additional aid to enforcement and is required also, in a slightly different form, in New York (C. L., ch. 31, art. 6, par. 77, subdiv. 5) and in New Jersey (acts of 1912, ch. 216).

SEC. 7. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to appoint three inspectors to carry out the purposes of this act at a compensation not exceeding $1,200 each per annum.

SEC. 8. That the inspectors authorized by this act may in the discharge of their duties enter any place, building, or room where any labor is being performed by females which is affected by the provisions of this chapter whenever such inspectors may have reasonable cause to believe that any such labor is being performed therein.

SEC. 9. That the inspectors authorized by this act shall visit and inspect the establishments and places of employment named in section 1 as often as practicable, during reasonable hours, and shall cause the provisions of this act to be enforced therein. They shall report any cases of illegal employment contrary to the provisions of this act to the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 10. That any person who violates or does not comply with any of the provisions of this act shall upon conviction be punished for a first offense by a fine of not less than $20 nor more than $50; for a second offense, by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $200; for a third offense, by a fine of not less than $250.

These sections follow the provisions of the District of Columbia child-labor law as to the appointment of inspectors, procedure, and so forth.

STATUS OF THE BILL.

A similar bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator LA FOLLETTE, and has been favorably reported, with certain amendments, to that body. This bill as amended was passed by the Senate February 27. The bill which I have read to you was introduced in the House by me and referred to the Labor Committee, which held extended hearings during the first two weeks of February. This committee has now unanimously reported the bill to this body without amendment.

I might say at this point that though we are hopeful of immediate action, if, in the general congestion of business during the closing hours of the session, this bill is not reached and finally disposed of I shall reintroduce the bill at the opening of the next Congress and continue to press it for favorable consideration.

This eight-hour bill as introduced in both Houses includes practically all classes of women over 18 years of age employed in gainful occupations, except those employed in private homes to do household work. The feature of the bill is the provision that no women included in these several occupations shall be permitted to work more than 8 hours in any one day or more than 6 days or more than 48 hours in any one week. Moreover, as provided in section 3, where a woman is employed by more than one concern or employer, the total time of employment shall not exceed that allowed per day or week in a single establishment or occupation. The remaining provisions of the bill provide for the necessary regulations to enforce the eight-hour day.

The House committee has not changed this bill in reporting it to this body, but in the Senate two amendments of some importance were accepted. The first amendment struck out section 1, which designated the women affected by the law and substituted the wording of the California law, which is, in effect, practically the same as originally introduced, except that this change amounts to the omission of women employed in offices. The other principal amendment struck out all of section 3.

LIMITING HOURS NOT AN EXPERIMENT.

This bill as originally introduced by me and as reported to the House is not an experiment. It is based on the most desirable features of the best laws which have been enacted by the different States. You may not know that there are already 30 States in the Union which have more or less effective laws regulating the hours of labor for women. The District of Columbia is one of the few divisions of our country which still lags behind in this class of legislation. In fact, the only provision of any kind, so far as I have been able to learn which we have here in the District for the protection of employed women is one requiring a reasonable number of seats for clerks when not engaged in waiting on customers.

It is this state of affairs—this surprising inertia on the part of the Federal Government, which legislates for the District of Columbia—which caused the National Consumers' League to start a campaign of enlightenment here in this city and to ask for immediate action on the part of Congress. The officers of the National Consumers' League prepared the bill, which is before us, after a careful study of the provisions of the laws of this nature existing in the several States. I am especially interested in being sponsor for this bill in the House, for when I was in the Massachusetts State Senate I was on the committee on relations of employer to employee and sat in extended hearings relative to a law which was before us for the protection of women in mercantile establishments in the city of Boston, a bill very similar to this one, but one which, I am frank to say, was not as good a one as this. This bill has been a help to the women of my home city, and the mercantile establishments themselves recognize its justice and say that they would not care to go back to the conditions which prevailed there before this bill was enacted.

California, Colorado, and Washington have already adopted the eight-hour law for women, and I wish to say that the bill now under consideration was drafted with special reference to the laws in these three States where the eight-hour day has proven a decided success. You may be interested to know that Congress is not the only body seriously considering limiting the hours of labor for women. Legislation to limit the hours of labor either by amending the present law or by adopting new laws is pending in Delaware, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, and Pennsylvania, and eight-hour bills have been introduced in the Legislatures of Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Oregon, Texas, and Wyoming.

There can be little question of the attitude which Congress should take toward a bill of this nature when 30 of the 48 States represented here already have laws along the lines now proposed. Moreover, we have even more convincing proof that Congress takes a favorable attitude toward legislation of this nature. During nearly 20 years men employed by the Government as laborers or as mechanics have had the eight-hour day, and in this very Congress a law has been enacted extending this limitation of hours for men to laborers and mechanics employed by contractors doing work for the Federal Government.

CONSTITUTIONALITY.

There may be some question of constitutionality in the minds of those who have not given this bill close consideration, but this mist of apprehension can be quickly dispelled. Let me call your attention to the fact that during the last five years the right of States under their police powers to limit the hours for women has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States (Muller v. Oregon, 208 U. S., 412, decided in 1908) and by the supreme courts of five States: Illinois, in two decisions (244 Ill., 509, 1910; 98 N. E. Rep., 982), decided in 1912; Michigan (163 Mich., 419), 1911; Ohio (98 N. E. Rep., 1126), 1912; Washington, 1912; California (124 Pac. Rep., 427), 1912.

In the Muller case the Federal Supreme Court upheld the validity of the Oregon 10-hour law for women. It was the first case in which the highest tribunal of the country had been called upon to render a decision as to the validity of a law limiting the hours of labor of adult women. It was the most sweeping decision ever rendered by the Federal Supreme Court in relation to working hours. It left to the States liberty to determine what working hours were wholesome and reasonable and took the broad ground that the physical organization of women and the necessity of protecting their health, in behalf of the health of the whole Nation, justified legislation to protect them from exhaustion due to excessive hours of labor.

The reasoning of the Muller case has been uniformly followed in all subsequent decisions of the courts regarding legislation of this character. In the last two cases decided in 1912 by the Supreme Courts of Washington and California, the laws limited the employment of women to eight hours in one day, and this limit was also in each case held to be a reasonable one.

NEED OF PROTECTION FOR WOMEN.

I have given but a brief discussion of the constitutionality of this question, because I believe that the facts in the case are so conclusive and so generally known that there is no need to take any great amount of your time, nor do I propose to question the intelligence of the membership of this body with a long discussion of the general advisability for limiting the hours of work for women. This is largely a physiological question, and I do not anticipate that the relation between fatigue and efficiency and between overwork and the health of women is unknown to you. Since we consider it wise to protect by an eight-hour day, so far as we can, the men working directly and indirectly for the Government, how much more necessary is it that we make every effort to give similar protection to as large a proportion as possible of the future motherhood of the citizenship of this country. In this connection I wish to quote you from the report submitted by the District Commissioners indorsing this bill:

> Careful research, made both in this country and in Europe, has established the fact that where women are compelled to labor long hours under either physical or mental strain it results in impairment of their health. Where the employment is of a physical nature organic changes occur which physicians have long recognized as causing much of the chronic invalidism among women. It is likewise true that prolonged mental strain has its injurious effects. The evil result of overwork is not confined to the women themselves, but is an important factor in infant morbidity and mortality.
> There are no large factories in the District of Columbia, and therefore there is not the demand for female employees that exists in some of the larger cities. But the employment of women is on the increase here as elsewhere, and legislation enacted now will not only tend to correct such abuses as exist, but to prevent their further development.

The last paragraph of this report introduces a subject which has been materially enlarged upon by local opponents of the bill. It is stated that Washington is not a manufacturing city, and it is therefore concluded that there is no need for a law of this nature; that the good which we seek to do by protecting the health of women is practically nullified because there is no necessity for such protection.

This is, in part at least, a misstatement of the case. In the first place, there are more establishments here than one at first surmises, and, in the second place, it is the case that certain abuses exist which demand our attention. It must be kept in mind in this discussion that this law will not materially affect employment where the hours are reasonable, but it is aimed only at those cases where there are excessive hours and where they may become even more excessive if a law similar to this is not enacted.

CONDITIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Let us now consider conditions as they actually are in the District of Columbia.

I desire to call your attention to a few facts from a preliminary report which has been compiled by the Department of Commerce and Labor relative to hours, earnings, and duration of employment of wage-earning women in the District of Columbia. That department is making a series of reports on the subject of the employment of women and children. While the report concerning conditions in the District of Columbia has not yet been published, through the courtesy of the department I had an opportunity to look into the report.

WOMEN EMPLOYED IN STORES.

The first division of this report deals with the employees of the retail stores. The report of the investigator shows that the average hours of employment in the retail stores of the District of Columbia were from 9 to 9½ hours, considerably in excess of the 8-hour day, which we propose to provide for in our bill, and considerably in excess of the hours which the men are allowed to work who are employed by the Government. The report shows that the retail stores constitute the largest employers of women. The chief objections to be met in store work are due to overtime work during the holiday season and in the long hours every Saturday throughout the greater part of the year.

The Christmas season brings to the hearts of most of our citizens very definitely a feeling of rest and happiness, but there is one class of people to whom it brings feelings of tremendous strain and overwork and suffering, and those are the people who work in the stores and meet the great increase in the demand on the employees which comes during the holiday season. It is entirely practicable to meet this demand by increasing the number of employees in the stores, and it has been done successfully by employers in my own State. This is not done, and apparently it will not be done, here unless the employers are in some way forced to do it.

Approximately 70 per cent of all the women examined by the investigator who were employed in the stores of the District of Columbia worked overtime during the week before Christmas; approximately 69 per cent of those examined who worked overtime at Christmas were employed 70 hours or over during that week. Thirty-one per cent of this number worked from 75 to 80 hours. It is therefore evident that the greater proportion of the women workers in the stores are subjected to a tremendous hardship a short time before Christmas. This investigation further showed that the hours of some of these employees were from 14 to 15 hours on the day before Christmas.

The detailed information gathered by this investigation, which will be included in the report, has not been published, but I have a good deal of it here. During this Christmas rush when the women were working overtime 31 per cent of them were working about 75 hours a week, while the men in the employ of the Government were still protected in their 8-hour day.

The other characteristic objection in the retail stores is in regard to the long hours on Saturday, and this report shows that 58 per cent of the employees who were examined by the investigator worked from 11 to 12 hours every Saturday in the year except a short time during the summer. It may also be of interest to know that of 2,670 girls in these department stores in the District the largest single group, constituting 16.7 per cent of the whole, received from $4 to $5 for their work. Of 193 personally scheduled and reporting as working overtime, 91.7 per cent got no extra pay for this work.

In this connection you may be interested to have a more detailed statement with reference to the wages paid in the District stores.

WOMEN EMPLOYED IN MANUFACTURING ESTABLISHMENTS.

The second main division of the report of the department considers the condition of women employed in manufacturing and mercantile establishments. According to the last census there were 828 employed in manufacturing establishments in the District. On the whole, their condition, so far as I learn from this report, seems to be rather good; 55.1 per cent of the 147 women scheduled work from 48 to 51 hours a week. On the other hand, it was found that 40 per cent of those reporting overtime to the examiner worked on an average from 65 to 75 hours a week, and 32 per cent worked from 60 to 64 hours a week.

I wish to add that in laundries employing about 700 women conditions were not so favorable; 47.7 per cent of the women scheduled in this report worked 55 to 59 hours per week; 54.5 per cent of these women worked 10 hours per day for at least four days in the week. In the busy season 44.7 per cent of the women reporting overtime were employed 12 hours per day. The examiner found that in three laundries the average wages for each woman was but $5.47, and that it was the universal custom of the laundries of this city not to pay for overtime work.

The following table will be of interest in determining with more detail the weekly rates of wages paid to women in the different manufacturing and mechanical establishments:

WOMEN EMPLOYED IN HOTELS, ETC.

The other main division of women employed in the District of Columbia includes those in hotels, restaurants, and miscellaneous establishments. Here the chief abuse lies in the seven-day week; 70 per cent of the women interviewed by the examiner for the department were employed seven days of the week, though not always the same hours. The report shows that about one-third of the women employed in these establishments had a maximum day of 12 hours, though the normal day was shorter.

I am furnishing a table from the department's report in this connection.

OPPOSITION TO THE BILL.

I have called your attention to this report of the Department of Commerce and Labor in order to show you that there are substantial reasons for the enactment of this bill. Conditions here are not, I dare say, as deplorable as in certain other cities, but that does not free us from responsibility when there are numerous instances where women are employed for excessive hours, and in many cases, particularly in the retail stores and laundries, with no extra pay for overtime.

At the hearing on this bill before the House Labor Committee a few merchants and manufacturers and laundrymen, on the whole representing the smaller class of establishments, appeared in opposition to the bill, and in the main advanced four objections: First, that this bill would result in replacing women by men; secondly, that the bill would work a hardship to seasonal businesses; thirdly, that certain work would be sent to neighboring cities; fourthly, that the wages of women would be reduced.

These objections are on the whole negligible. They are the stock objections which have been made to all movements to limit the hours of labor, and while it is true that in certain instances some few might be temporarily hampered, it is unquestionably the case that in the greater proportion of them it is merely a question of settling upon some new arrangement for planning the work or of the hire of extra help to do work which is now done in overtime hours. On the other hand the employees are benefited materially.

These objections have been current since 1837, when the first shorter-hour law was adopted in England, and the experience of time has been that in actual practice these laws have worked a great blessing and a negligible hardship. The commissioner of labor for the State of California reported last spring that the eight-hour law for women was being enforced in that State with practically no reduction in wages. In fact, the general experience has been that a reduction in hours has been accompanied with slightly increased wages. It is evident that no great difficulty will be experienced here in the stores and in many other trades where a day of eight or slightly in excess of eight hours already exists. This bill merely protects the employee from the inconsiderate employer and removes the advantage which certain less scrupulous and less enlightened employers now possess. Wages will continue to be controlled by supply and demand.

CONCLUSION.

I believe that it is granted that women need the protection of the eight-hour day on the general principle of protecting their health and the health of the whole Nation. I believe that it has been shown by this recent investigation of the department into the conditions of employment of women in the District of Columbia that there are far too many women in this city who are obliged to place themselves under conditions of work that cause an excessive strain on their physical and mental constitution to permit of a delay in enacting this bill. I can heartily advocate the passage of this bill on these grounds alone.

NEED OF A MODEL LAW.

But there is one other form of responsibility which rests upon us as Members of Congress. The District of Columbia is dependent upon Congress for laws, and we have up to this time taken no action on this very important subject. We have remained idle while two-thirds of our States have been enacting laws for their own and the Nation's protection.

I wish to impress this upon the House, which I believe to be one of the strongest arguments in favor of this bill, that the District of Columbia now stands in the unenviable position of being far behind the majority of the States of the Union in enacting legislation for the protection of women and children, and that we as Members of Congress, who have placed on us the responsibility for legislating for this District, should provide for it the best code of laws possible and the greatest protection for its citizens, not only in justice to them, but so that the laws of the District of Columbia can be pointed to with pride and will, in themselves, form a stimulus and encouragement to enact laws of this kind in the various States.

Samuel Gompers, the president of the American Federation of Labor, and the local secretaries of the Retail Clerks' Union, the Central Labor Union, and the Maryland State Federation of Labor have already appeared before the Labor Committee in support of this bill. It has the indorsement of the National Consumers' League, the National Child Labor Committee, and numerous societies and individuals, and I feel confident that it will shortly be passed by Congress and thereby receive the indorsement of the great mass of the people of this country through their elected Representatives.

The Dawn of Peace.

SPEECH

OF

HON. RICHARD BARTHOLDT,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 4, 1913.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave generously extended to me by the House, I beg to insert the following in the RECORD, a poem by Alfred Noyes, who has been hailed by writers like Swinburne, Rudyard Kipling, and Edmund Goss as the greatest English poet since Tennyson. This beautiful poem on "Peace" is taken from the New York Times, and runs as follows:

THE DAWN OF PEACE.

[A new poem by Alfred Noyes, the English poet.]

Recent utterances of the President of the United States are a distinct advance for the cause of international arbitration.

The hour of universal peace has struck. (M. Jaures, in the French Chamber.)

Yes: "on our brows we feel the breath
Of dawn," though in the night we wait;
An arrow is in the heart of death,
A god is at the doors of fate!
The spirit that moved upon the deep
Is moving through the minds of men;
The nations feel it in their sleep
A change has touched their dreams again.

Voices, confused and faint, arise,
Troubling their hearts from east and west;
A doubtful light is in their skies,
A gleam that will not let them rest;
The dawn, the dawn is on the wing,
The stir of change on every side,
Unsignaled as the approach of spring,
Invincible as the hawthorn tide.

Have ye not heard it, far and nigh,
The voice of France across the dark,
And all the Atlantic with one cry
Beating the shores of Europe? Hark!
Then—if ye will—uplift your word
Of cynic wisdom! Once again
Tell us He came to bring a sword,
Tell us he lived and died in vain.

Say that we dream! Our dreams have woven
Truths that outface the burning sun;
The lightnings, that we dreamed, have cloven
Time, space, and linked all lands in one.
Dreams! But their swift celestial fingers
Have knit the world with threads of steel,
Till no remotest island lingers
Outside the world's great commonweal.

Tell us that custom, sloth, and fear
Are strong, then name them "common sense"!
Tell us that greed rules everywhere,
Then dub the lie "experience";
Year after year, age after age,
Has handed down, thro' fool and child.
For earth's divinest heritage
The dreams whereon old wisdom smiled.

Dreams, are they? But ye can not stay them,
Or thrust the dawn back for one hour!
Truth, love, and justice, if ye slay them,
Return with more than earthly power;
Strive, if ye will, to seal the fountains
That send the spring thro' leaf and spray;
Drive back the sun from the eastern mountains,
Then bid this mightier movement stay.

The hour of peace is come! The nations
From east to west have heard a cry,
"Though all earth's blood-red generations
By hate and slaughter climbed thus high,
Here—on this height—still to aspire,
One only path remains untrod,
One path of love and peace climbs higher!
Make straight the highway for our God."

We Denounce the Profligate Waste of Money Wrung from the People by Oppressive Taxation Through the Lavish Appropriations of Recent Republican Congresses, Which Have Kept Taxes High and Reduced the Purchasing Power of the People's Toil. We Demand a Return to that Simplicity and Economy Which Befits a Democratic Government and a Reduction in the Number of Useless Offices, the Salaries of Which Drain the Substance of the People.

OF

HON. JOSEPH G. CANNON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 4, 1913,

On the subject of appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the appropriations of this session, including the Sundry Civil and Indian acts, amount to $1,098,647,960.21, and additional to that sum contracts are authorized or public works provided for involving further and ultimate expenditures amounting to not less than $76,956,174, making in all a grand total of obligations against the National Treasury of $1,175,604,134.21. This is a sum so vast in comparison with the total appropriations and authorizations of other sessions of Congress as to be almost unbelievable and to suggest humble apologies from the people and the press who have criticized other Congresses for extravagance. All performances of Republican Houses pale into utter insignificance when placed in contrast with what the Democratic House of Representatives of the Sixty-second Congress has accomplished in emptying the Treasury and piling up obligations against revenues to be derived by direct taxation and from revenue or free-trade tariff laws, for which the new administration stands committed and solemnly pledged.

Either Republican chairmen of appropriating committees of the past were more potential in restraining the membership of the House from extravagance than our Democratic successors have been, or else those sought to be restrained upon the Republican side of the House when the Republican Party was in control were more amenable to reason and less inordinate in their demands than those who now constitute the majority of this House.

Whether it be that the chairmen of appropriating committees have been weak and impotent or that the great majority of Democrats in control of this House have been unbridled and beyond restraint in their efforts to erect costly public buildings in small villages, in providing for river and harbor improvements where commerce did not justify expenditures, in creating new offices and raising salaries of Government employees literally by the thousand, or in increasing one of the great appropriation bills millions of dollars beyond the estimates of the Executive, I submit that upon whichever horn of the dilemma this Democratic House in closing its extravagant career must confess itself impaled, we, the Republicans, are quite content to leave them to the sober judgment of the country.

I will print as a part of my remarks a statement exhibiting by titles of appropriation acts the appropriations made at each of the two regular sessions of this and the last Congress. This exhibit shows that the present Congress, with its large Democratic majority in the House, has increased direct appropriations over those made by the previous Congress, controlled by a Republican majority in both branches, by the immense sum of $63,476,160.22, and that the contract liabilities and obligations in the nature of authorized public works, additional to specific appropriations, for the session now closing exceed those of the last session of the last Republican Congress by more than $23,383,889, or a total excess of combined direct appropriations and authorized expenditures by this Congress over its Republican predecessor of $86,860,049.22.

Nor should it be overlooked that of the $43,454,145 of contracts authorized at the last session of the last Republican House $30,352,500 was for battleships and other vessels for the American Navy, in which all patriotic citizens are equally interested, and nothing was authorized for public buildings in local communities. Of the contracts and obligations authorized this session and to be appropriated for hereafter the sum of more than $45,000,000 is for public buildings, the greater number of which are purely of local interest, not necessary to the public service, and when finished their annual upkeep and operation will impose a fixed charge against the Treasury four times greater than ample and suitable quarters for the public business would cost each year in nearly every locality thus provided with a public building.

The total revenues of the Government, according to the estimates for the next fiscal year, under existing Federal tax laws will amount to only $991,791,508, or $106,856,452.21 less than the direct appropriations made this session, and if we add to the latter the sum of contracts and obligations authorized in addition that will have to be appropriated for the deficit will reach $183,812,626.21.

In every legitimate avocation in life, governmental and otherwise, the matter of expenditures must inexorably govern or be governed by the matter of income, otherwise the conflict that is inevitable will spell confusion and bankruptcy. Expenditures made or solemnly pledged can not be honorably recalled, and that means in this dilemma that the Democratic House has plunged the country into a financial situation that signifies, if anything, increased taxation.

And so we have this situation:

The Democratic Party solemnly promised, if intrusted with the reins of government, to reduce expenditures. With its customary failure to perform according to its pledges, it has enormously increased expenditures.

It has promised, with even greater solemnity, to reduce the burdens of taxation. It has, by legislation for which it is responsible, made it practically impossible to avoid an increase in taxation.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, at the last session of Congress, stated that the deficiency bill then enacted was the smallest passed since 1886—a year, by the way, when the Democrats controlled this body. At that time I ventured the prediction that at the present session we would be required to pass the largest deficiencies called for at any time since 1886, because of the inadequacy of appropriations for current expenses of the Government then being made in the face of an approaching presidential campaign. That the prediction is more than verified is shown by the fact that the deficiency act at this session, carrying more than $28,000,000, is the largest in the history of the Government, except the deficiency acts carrying appropriations for conducting the War with Spain, those providing the initial amounts for beginning the construction of the Panama Canal, and one or two others that carried supplemental amounts for the customs service, since included in the Sundry Civil Acts, and deficiencies growing out of the naval cruise around the world.

The Democracy have heretofore stood for economy in public expenditures; but, judging by the record that party has made during the Sixty-second Congress, with 64 majority in this House and the Republicans in a minority in the Senate, its zeal for economy has become a mere tradition. During the last session of this Congress a total increase of 7,049 places was added to the salaried roll of the Government, making a permanent annual charge on the Treasury of $7,696,662.50.

At no previous session of Congress, save when the Army was reorganized, has this record been approached by scarcely more than one-half. Think for a moment what this means—more than 7,000 employees, equal to an army of seven regiments, with yearly pay exceeding $7,000,000 fastened in perpetuity on the Treasury and by a party that pretends to stand for economy and reform, a party that had just succeeded to power chiefly on the claim that we on this side of the House were running the Government extravagantly and that they, being more virtuous and entirely frugal, were going to cut down expenditures.

At that same session 308 salaries were increased, to the extent of $91,745 per annum, and 69 were reduced. Included in the latter were 55 supposedly overpaid officials, whose annual pay was reduced in the sum of $20 each. There was also included among this unfortunate class the Secretary to the President, whose pay had been fixed by a Republican Congress at $7,500. It was strenuously argued by the dress-parade economists during the last session that such a sum was extravagant, and it was accordingly reduced in August last to $6,000, but with the advent of Democratic frugality the salary has been hastily and rightfully restored at this session to its former measure of $7,500 per annum; and this record is presented to the country as one of real economy.

In 1885 a Democratic House of Representatives, under the leadership of an eminent statesman of that time, actuated by a desire to humiliate and dethrone a rival party leader, changed its rules so as to take from one committee control over the preparation of all appropriation bills and distribute the responsibility of their preparation in the first instance among eight different committees. Mr. Speaker, that change, in my judgment, based upon intimate knowledge and observation, has cost this country many, many millions of dollars in needless appropriations and expenditures, and is primarily responsible for the deplorable condition now confronting the country as a result of authorized excessive expenditures at this session and a national balance sheet exhibiting a debit side exceeding that of the credit side by more than $183,000,000.

Either payments under authorized expenditures for the ensuing fiscal year must be suspended or large additional revenues must be gathered by increased taxation or money must be borrowed under a bond issue. This condition I imagine does not bring much comfort to President Wilson as he is about to assume the responsibilities of his great office.

There has been recent discussion in this House and elsewhere on the subject of a national budget. The very term in itself is wholly inapplicable to our system of government; it contemplates both expenditures and taxes and, as used by the British Government, implies a scheme of expenditure and taxation prepared and submitted by the ministry to the Commons which must be accepted as a whole by the latter; otherwise the Government is discredited and a new ministry must be called into power. The ministry of Great Britain is chosen from the membership of the House of Commons, to which body those composing it are elected by the people, and in that way they are directly responsible to the people. With us the selection of members of the President's so-called Cabinet is a matter resting wholly in the discretion of the President, and they are answerable solely to him except in matters involving high crimes and misdemeanors in office, for which they are impeachable by the Congress. They are not constitutional officers, nor do I know of more than one reference to them as members of the "President's Cabinet" in any law passed by Congress. I do not believe that intrusting them with power over appropriations other than that of merely submitting recommendations in the shape of estimates would ever meet with popular approval or a fair measure of success if tried.

In my opinion, the creation of a budget committee of the House to exercise supervisory power over other committees would not prove practicable, unless such committee, in the first instance, inquired into the estimates and the detailed requirements of the public service to such an extent as would obviate the necessity of further work on the part of other committees. The House would not be governed by the recommendation of a budget committee in the event of conflict with the committees charged with finally reporting appropriation bills and there would in all likelihood be serious conflict over every supply bill.

Mr. Speaker, committees charged with the dual function of originating legislation and preparing appropriation bills have quite abandoned in nearly every instance the exercise of their functions with reference to originating or considering and recommending bills devoted solely to legislation. They concentrate their whole time and energy on the work of preparing the appropriation bills and saddling upon them such legislation as may be unobjected to or for the consideration of which they may be able to extort a special rule. This results in the enactment of ill-considered legislation and extravagant appropriations. Such a condition is vicious in the extreme and should be broken up by restoring to the great committees of the House their former dignity, power, and efficiency in considering and reporting bills recommending general legislation.

The House should never enter into any agreement with the Senate that could by any possibility affect its right to control the origination of revenue bills, including appropriation bills. Any agreement with that body, by joint rule or otherwise, would be a concession implying a right of initiative over the supply bills that should never be conceded by this House. A budget committee such as has been suggested, aside from all other objections, would be ineffective in its work without a joint rule binding the Senate equally with the House in the scheme.

When the Democrats assumed control of this body in 1875, for the first time following the outbreak of the Civil War, our total national expenditures amounted to only about $328,000,000. The Committee on Appropriations, at that time in charge of all supply bills, reduced the appropriations more than $40,000,000 as they passed the House and nearly $30,000,000 as they ultimately became law. Some things demanded by the Executive went undone, some public officials had their salaries and perquisites curtailed, and some useless employees lost their jobs, but events proved that no legitimate function of government suffered. It was subsequently publicly stated by John Sherman, while Secretary of the Treasury, that it was this heroic reduction in expenditures that made resumption of specie payment possible.

No matter what the stress of circumstances may bring about in our national life now or hereafter, or how necessary it may become to apply the pruning knife, it can never be done without harsh and inequitable results through the medium of many committees as now provided under our House rules.

I speak with deep and firm conviction in these premises and after many years of somewhat arduous labor as a member of the Committee on Appropriations when it controlled all of the bills, both under Democratic and Republican Houses, and as its chairman when it controlled only a portion of the bills, and as a member of it under Democratic Houses under like conditions.

During the 38 years I have been a Member of the National House of Representatives I have served probably with over 5,000 different Representatives, the average length of service of a Representative being about three years. It has been my observation that the highest efficiency in matters of legislation, particularly as affecting appropriation measures, requires knowledge of the public service, which, as a general rule, can only be obtained by industry and length of service. Knowledge, industry, and length of service, however, can not alone be counted on unless the rules and practice of the body are such as to fix responsibility and perfect a practical and efficient organization.

From the time of the adoption of the Constitution substantially down to the beginning of the Sixty-second Congress the Speaker of the House, chosen by a majority of the House and at all times their servant, was intrusted with the power to designate the membership of the committees of the House under a rule which provided:

> Rule X. Unless otherwise specially ordered by the House, the Speaker shall appoint at the commencement of each Congress the following standing committees—

Although under the language of this rule the House at any time had the power to order otherwise, that power was never exercised by the House, and the Speaker was charged with the primary responsibility for a proper organization of the House. Being thus responsible, it was his duty, taking into consideration the whole membership, from the standpoint of the equipment, length of service, ability, and locality of each Member, so to organize the House as to secure the highest efficiency.

At the beginning of the Sixty-second Congress, when the Democratic Party assumed control of the House, the rule was changed, and it was provided:

> There shall be elected by the House at the commencement of each Congress the following standing committees—

Under this rule as it worked out in practice, instead of the Speaker designating the committees of the House and being responsible therefor, the personnel of the committees was made up primarily by the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee holding over from the Sixty-first Congress. These gentlemen, acting on their own motion, made up the list, necessarily being compelled to compromise among themselves, and taking care that assignments should be so made as to command a majority vote of approval in the Democratic caucus.

The record made by the Democratic House of the Sixty-second Congress, as evidenced by a mass of ill-considered legislation and enormous and improper increases in appropriations, as I have endeavored to set forth, is due largely to the inefficient organization of the House and to the absence of personal responsibility on the part of those who dictated the organization.

After this experience it is my opinion that in the future the record of the House of Representatives will go from bad to worse until there is again vested in the Speaker the power to organize committees and until the preparation of the supply bills is again intrusted to the jurisdiction and control of one committee, which, under the rules, shall have a free hand in the preparation of the measures they submit to the House for its approval.

As I am about to take my departure from this body after long service in the House of Representatives, I feel that there is no final word I can speak of greater import to the economic welfare of my country than thus to call attention to the blunder made under the leadership of Mr. Morrison in 1885 in destroying all responsibility for and control of appropriations in this body, and the equally great blunder committed by the Democratic majority of this House in inaugurating a system destructive of all responsibility for the organization of committees.

Executive Responsibility for Large Appropriations—Rules of the House Must be Changed in Order to Reduce Expenditures.

OF

HON. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 4, 1913,

On the subject of appropriations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith the history of appropriation bills presented customarily at the close of each regular session of Congress.

It is a matter of considerable satisfaction that the total of appropriations, including the Sundry Civil and Indian bills, attained only the sum stated, to wit, $1,098,647,960.21, and did not reach or pass the $1,100,000,000 mark.

The increase in the total of appropriations is due to many causes. The continued growth and development of the country, the increased activity of many services of the Federal Government, and the constant pressure to divert to the Federal Treasury burdens which properly belong elsewhere, are all factors which tend more or less legitimately to increase the cost of the Federal Government.

Such causes necessarily impose additional obligations upon the Treasury, but they are neither the chief nor the most troublesome obstacles toward the coordination and systemization of our expenditures necessary to increased efficiency without proportionate additional expense.

Despite the frequent intimations from the executive departments that unusual efforts were being made to effect economies in the administration of the public service, the total estimates of appropriations transmitted to Congress in the regular Book of Estimates at the opening of the session, exclusive of deficiencies and miscellaneous items, were $113,415,455.14 in excess of the estimated revenues, and, excluding the amounts required for sinking-fund purposes ($60,685,000) and for the construction and fortification of the Panama Canal ($30,174,432.11) and without reference to deficiencies and miscellaneous items, the total estimates of appropriations exceeded the estimated revenues $22,556,023.03.

This estimated deficit was not due to an anticipated falling off in the revenues. For the fiscal year 1913—the current year—the Treasury Department's estimate of revenues is as follows:

Amount of estimated revenues	$667,000,000.00
Amount of estimated postal revenues	260,938,463.00
Total	927,938,463.00
For the fiscal year 1914:
Amount of estimated revenues	710,000,000.00
Amount of estimated postal revenues	281,791,508.00
Total	991,791,508.00

The estimated revenues for 1914 are $63,853,045 in excess of the estimated revenues for the current year; but the estimates of the money required to conduct the public service, as submitted December last by the outgoing administration, are $98,943,904.83 in excess of the estimates for the current year.

It was a notorious fact that the enactment of the modified Sherwood pension law subsequent to the passage of the pension appropriation act in the last session would necessitate very substantial additional appropriations at this session. With the miscellaneous obligations authorized at every session of Congress and the amounts required for legalized deficiencies, the deficit predicted by the Treasury Department of $22,556,023.03 more accurately should have been placed at least at $50,000,000.

The indifference of the administration to this situation readily misled Congress as to the country's financial condition.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury disclosed in the fiscal year 1912 a surplus of ordinary receipts over ordinary expenditures of $37,553,963.47. In itself a temptation to reckless expenditure, failure to comply with an important and most beneficial law eliminated a check that undoubtedly would have been effective.

In 1909 Congress enacted the so-called Smith amendment. It required the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever the estimates of appropriations exceed the estimated revenues, to transmit the estimates of appropriations and revenues to the President at the time he transmits them to Congress, so that the President may—advise the Congress how, in his judgment, the estimated appropriations could, with least injury to the public, be reduced so as to bring the appropriations within the estimated revenues, or, if such reduction be not, in his judgment, practicable without undue injury to the public service, that he may recommend to Congress such loans or new taxes as may be necessary to cover the deficiency.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury disclosed an anticipated deficit of $22,556,023.03; but Congress never received from the President the information which the statute directed him to furnish.

A message complying with that law would have presented succinctly to the country the budget. Our needs could thus have been emphasized and attention directed to the undesirable or unnecessary proposals to drain the Treasury; but the law was ignored or disregarded, and the Congress and the country were deprived of the illuminating effect that compliance with the law would have had.

Failure to observe the requirements of the Smith amendment is the more significant since one of the last messages of the President transmitted a so-called "national budget" to Congress for its information.

As a result of many years of experience and study I am convinced that little change is needed in the laws regulating the preparation and submission of estimates. What is required is that the existing laws be observed and the responsibility for the adequacy of appropriations be left, where it belongs, with Congress.

When the present system of preparing and handling appropriation bills in Congress is considered, it is a matter of surprise that the appropriations are not much in excess of their present totals. There is no system at present, and there can be no such systematic consideration of estimates under the present methods of the House as is essential.

The practice of divided responsibility in the preparation of the annual appropriation bills has been, ever since its adoption, subjected to the severest adverse criticism by the press and by public men who have discussed it. I can recall but one instance of praise for it, and from that I shall quote at length later on. Hon. Mahlon Pitney, now a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, made the question the subject of an able and notable speech in the House of Representatives February 13, 1897.

The appropriations for the support of the Government are carried in 13 annual bills, to wit, the Agriculture; the Army; the Diplomatic and Consular; the District of Columbia; the Fortifications; the Indian; the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial; the Military Academy; the Naval; the Pension; the Post Office; the Sundry Civil; and the Deficiency. In addition the River and Harbor bill has been enacted annually during the past three years and carries amounts in addition to the contract requirements in the Sundry Civil bill.

The Committee on Appropriations has jurisdiction and control of the District of Columbia; the Fortifications; the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial; the Pension; the Sundry Civil; and the Deficiency bills. The Committee on Military Affairs prepares the Army and the Military Academy bills, and the other bills are prepared by different committees. Eight different committees unrelated to one another, without cooperation, are charged with the duty of preparing appropriation bills. No definite policy can be laid out and followed, but every committee does its work with little regard to the others or to the final results. The Committee on Appropriations, having five of the annual supply bills and the deficiency bills, can organize its work along definite lines and prepare its bills in harmony with an agreed policy, but it can not coordinate its work with the other committees.

In my opinion all of the appropriation bills should be prepared in one committee. It is the only logical method. Considering our system of government, other schemes designed to accomplish the desired end will not succeed. It would be just as sensible to distribute control of tariff rates on articles in the various schedules to different committees as to continue the present control of appropriations.

Unfortunately whenever it is proposed to consolidate the appropriation bills in one committee the suggestion is construed as a reflection or a criticism on the personnel of some of the committees of the House. It is neither a criticism nor a reflection on any committee or any individual. The trouble is not with committees or with individuals; it is with a system that necessarily is bad, and it can not be operated under any check or regulation to improve conditions that can not be bettered while the system continues.

Early in the near future I purpose to discuss at length the entire subject, answering objections that have been advanced, outlining the changes necessary in the rules to prevent the committee charged with the duty of recommending appropriations becoming an important legislative committee, and at the same time inducing committees which now have jurisdiction of appropriations and legislation for particular departments to devote themselves exclusively to the many important legislative questions which await careful and deliberate and earnest consideration. If such were done, some further and simple changes in the rules of the House would be necessary to insure time for the consideration of such measures as would be presented, the time for consideration to be definite and not dependent upon the caprice of the majority or of any individual.

At this time it may perhaps be desirable to recall that until 1865 the Committee on Ways and Means had jurisdiction of the appropriation bills as well as bills designed to raise revenue.

Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, then the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the resolution to create the Committee on Appropriations, and retired from the Ways and Means Committee to go to the head of the new committee.

In 1880 the Agricultural bill was taken from the committee, and in 1885, in order to cripple the supposedly excessive power of Samuel J. Randall, the Committee on Appropriations was stripped of control of the Army, Diplomatic and Consular, the Military Academy, the Indian, Navy, and Post Office bills.

I have heard it stated by men who participated in that movement that the appropriations during the following six years, computed on a per capita basis, exceeded the appropriations during the six years immediately preceding by approximately the amount for which President Cleveland was compelled to issue bonds to maintain the gold reserve.

The results of the distribution of control of the bills are in harmony with the predictions of those who opposed the change.

The vice of the system is well pointed out in an article by Dr. Harlan Updegraff, of the Bureau of Education, in an article entitled "The United States Bureau of Education," in the American School Board Journal for May, 1912. In explaining the failure to obtain large appropriations for the Bureau of Education he writes as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEDURE A HINDRANCE.

If, during the past 40 years, the Commissioner of Education had been granted lump-sum appropriations from which he could have paid salaries fairly commensurate with those paid by local public and private agencies throughout the United States, and had it been possible for him to set aside proper amounts for traveling expenses, the bureau would have made a far greater impress upon educational policy and practice. In consequence of the higher appreciation which would have resulted, it is also quite probable that the Congress would have increased its appropriations from year to year until their magnitude would have become more nearly commensurate with the high regard in which all Americans hold their public schools.

However, there is an underlying cause for this situation in the business procedure of each of the two Houses of Congress. Under this procedure the estimates for some departments are acted upon by their friends at court, while the estimates for other departments are passed on by a tribunal whose main object is economy. All appropriation bills for the Department of Agriculture are prepared in the House Committee on Agriculture, and are reviewed in the Senate by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. This same practice also holds with the appropriations for the Diplomatic Service, the military service, the naval service, and the postal service. On the other hand, the appropriations for the other branches of the executive departments are prepared by the Committee on Appropriations of the House and are referred in the Senate to its committee of like name. Quite naturally the attitude of these Committees on Appropriations toward the estimates submitted by their respective branches of the executive department is distinctly different from that shown by the committees which recommend the appropriations for a single department or bureau. Members of the latter class of committees have their attention centered on one particular set of governmental activities, which they hold in growing appreciation as their knowledge of the work increases. On the other hand, members of the Committees on Appropriations have their attention divided among several departments and independent offices and commissions, all of which are more or less desirous of increased funds. Strong attachment to the work of any branch of the Government service is not fostered by such a condition. Moreover, the numerous insistent demands that come upon them develop a controlling idea in the minds of these Appropriations Committees—not the great good that may come to the people through any branch of the service, but rather the desirability of cutting appropriations to the lowest possible limit in order that the party in power will not be held accountable for large expenditures. In brief, all the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, and the principal appropriations for the War, Navy, and Post Office Departments, are in the hands of their friends, while those of the remaining Government offices must come before a tribunal the chief aim of which is to keep the total appropriations, including those framed by the special committees, within certain fixed limits. It follows from this that the liberal appropriations recommended by the special committees have a tendency to lower the appropriations for the other departments, which are drawn directly by the Appropriations Committees. Had the estimates of the Commissioner of Education during the past 40 years been referred in the House to the Committee on Education and in the Senate to the Committee on Education and Labor there would undoubtedly be to-day a far different story to tell. If such a reform in the procedure of the Houses could be carried out to-day, an increased participation of the National Government in the educational development of the country would probably result.

If the House of Representatives desires to reform its procedure, to make its control over the purse effective, to determine definitely policies from session to session or from Congress to Congress, to make possible the awakening of the public to the widespread effect extravagance in governmental affairs must have in every avenue of industry and in every household; if the Federal Treasury is not to be so overburdened in the near future with obligations which will require new, novel, and vexatious taxes, or the financing of our Federal undertakings by means of long or short time loans, then it is imperative that the methods of the House be changed in so far as the preparation and control of the supply bills are concerned. In my opinion, based upon my experience, study, and service during the past 14 years, and of the information I have acquired, both from those who have actively participated in the events of the past as well as from those who have reviewed and criticized with accurate and discriminating judgment from afar, the only change that is practical and will result in any substantial benefit is that which brings all of the money bills under the control of one committee.

The following comprehensive statement gives succinctly a history of the appropriation bills for the session, showing the estimates as submitted and the stages of consideration through which the several bills passed to final enactment.

The American Cotton Market.

SPEECH

OF

HON. LE ROY PERCY,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Wednesday, February 26, 1913.

The Senate had under consideration the bill (H. R. 56) to prohibit interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations, and to remove obstructions thereto, and to prohibit the transmission of certain messages by telegraph, telephone, cable, or other means of communication between States and Territories and foreign nations.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has no whit overstated the importance of this measure. The last time a discussion was had on the floor of the Senate in regard to gambling in cotton futures, on a bill to prohibit it, was something over 20 years ago, when what was known as the Hatch antioption bill was before the Senate. The bill here is one that deals with interests of tremendous magnitude and is far-reaching in its importance and consequences.

I disagree with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] that there is no question of constitutionality involved in the House bill now before the Judiciary Committee. In my judgment there is a serious question as to the constitutionality of the measure, and on that question the committee should report. The bill went to the proper committee. I am opposed to the House bill. I am opposed to any law which abolishes the exchanges of the country until the regulation of them has been proven a failure.

I am in sympathy with much that the Senator from South Carolina has stated, especially in regard to the abuses that obtain on the New York Cotton Exchange, permitting the tendering of low-grade, almost unspinable, cotton on future contracts, and the adjustment of the difference between that low-grade cotton to middling cotton by the rules of the exchange on an arbitrary difference and not on a commercial difference. Yet to show how the question of law enters into both of these measures I have no hesitancy whatever in making the statement that not one single transaction on the floor of any exchange will be reached or affected by the bill proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

The Supreme Court has, in a perfectly simple decision, by a unanimous court, decided that precise question—that the dealings on the floor of these exchanges are not interstate commerce; that they are begun, conducted, and ended on the floor of the exchange. The House bill treats gambling in cotton futures or speculation in cotton futures as an obstruction to commerce. The position is that, under the commerce clause, just as Congress can remove a bar which impedes navigation in a river in the interest of commerce so it can remove the exchanges which obstruct commerce—a most doubtful proposition. That, however, is not the theory of the bill of the Senator from South Carolina. It is that dealing on the exchanges in itself is commerce and can be regulated by Congress.

Mr. President, if this matter is to be voted on, coming from a cotton State, almost the only industry of which is the production of cotton, profoundly interested in this measure, I desire to be heard on it. I have no desire to take up the time of the Senate at this particular moment if the motion is not to be voted on, nor do I desire to delay a vote on it. With a fair discussion of the question I should prefer to have the Senate vote on the motion. But if the vote is to be taken, that discussion, so far as I am concerned, must precede the motion; and if it is sought now to take up the matter, I shall submit some remarks on it.

In dealing with the case I speak from the standpoint simply of a producer. Everything that, through years of labor, I have been able to accumulate is invested in cotton land. I am interested in this bill as a producer. If I disagree with those who advocate the passage of the House bill and with my friend from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], it is because I am satisfied that the passage of either measure would be detrimental to the interests of the cotton producers of this country.

That is a position that is not generally taken by representatives from the cotton States; and if I had any doubt in regard to the correctness of my position I might feel disposed to yield to the clamor that has, through the past quarter of a century, gone up from parts of the South for the passage of a measure abolishing the cotton exchanges of the country. But being interested in the practical question as profoundly as any producer can be and having no doubt about the correctness of my position, I can not be swerved from it by this clamor.

MEMORANDUM IN RE COTTON ANTIOPTION BILLS AND ESPECIALLY SENATE BILL 4654, INTRODUCED BY SENATOR SMITH OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

I approach the consideration of this measure solely from the standpoint of a producer. Whatever I have been able to save as a result of a lifetime of labor is invested in cotton land, and if I differ from those who believe that this and similar measures calculated to destroy cotton exchanges or to eliminate speculation from them are in the interest of the producer the difference on my part is at least an honest one, as my sole interest in such legislation arises out of the effect of it upon the producer.

A bill favorably reported by one of the Senate committees can be said to be prima facie entitled to the favorable consideration of the Senate because such a bill, especially where it contains important legislation, is supposed to have been carefully considered by the committee charged with the consideration of it; the various interests affected by the bill are supposed to either have been heard on it or to have been given the opportunity of a hearing, and when there is no minority report, the bill is supposed to have behind it the approval of the entire committee. This bill, for none of the reasons given, is entitled to the favorable consideration of the Senate merely because it has been favorably reported by the Committee on Agriculture. I presume, under the rules of the Senate, it is permissible for me to say that only one hearing was had on this most important piece of legislation, and no one at that hearing, at which all interested in cotton were given the opportunity of presenting their views, favored this bill. There was practically no discussion of it in the committee. It was reported out by a divided committee. The bill must stand or fall on its own merits.

This is the first bill which has been favorably reported by a Senate committee having for its object the regulating of future contracts in cotton or the prohibition of speculation in future dealings in cotton in 20 years. The last bill along these lines considered by the Senate was known as the Hatch antioption bill, and the debate on that bill participated in by a number of the ablest men in the United States Senate occurred in 1892. That bill, however, affected all agricultural products; this, cotton alone. If the regulation of dealing in future cotton is a wise one to be undertaken by the Federal Government, why limit it to cotton? The Senators and Representatives from the great West are usually keenly alive to the interests of their constituents and, unquestionably, would extend the provisions of this bill to wheat and corn and other agricultural products if they deemed such Federal control to the interest of the producers.

However, before considering the general subject, I want to call the attention of the Senate to this specific bill. When the crudities of the bill are pointed out, the statement that the committee in charge of it did not carefully consider it will be seen to be unnecessary. If enacted into law, the bill would utterly fail to accomplish the purpose for which it was framed. It would accomplish, however, a purpose for which it was never intended.

There are two classes of future contracts; one made by the farmer intending to deliver at a future time the commodity specified or made by the manufacturer who contracts—not on the floor of an exchange—for the actual delivery of the specific grade of commodity required in his business; and the other, contracts made upon the floor of the exchanges of the country, there being only two cotton exchanges—one in New Orleans and one in New York. Undoubtedly the object of this bill was to require after providing for the Government standards being used in contracts for future delivery, and this provision I consider advantageous was to regulate the future sales on the floors of these exchanges. It provides that in offering for sale cotton for future delivery the grade of the cotton shall be specified in the contract and the seller shall be required to deliver either the grade contracted for or a grade one above or one below that contracted for, but—and I ask that this provision be noted—the bill only applies to interstate commerce. I have no hesitancy in saying that by reason of this provision not one single contract upon the floor of an exchange is reached or in any way affected by the provisions of the bill, and these are the only contracts for future delivery that it was sought by this bill to regulate, the regulation of other contracts being merely incidental to this object of the bill. These contracts are now made upon the floors of the New York and New Orleans cotton exchanges. They are made upon what is called the basis of middling cotton, and the seller is entitled to deliver under that contract any cotton from middling fair to good ordinary, according to the grades established by the rules of the exchange on a basis of difference between the value of middling cotton and the grade or grades delivered, fixed by the rules of the exchange. The bill seeks to restrict that contract so as to make only a grade above or a grade below middling deliverable under it, but the dealings on the exchanges are strictly intrastate commerce and not affected by the bill, which seeks only to deal with such contracts as constitute interstate commerce. Bills have been frequently before one or the other branch of Congress seeking to prohibit dealing in futures on the exchanges, and it has been sought to uphold the validity of such interference by the Federal Government on the theory that such future speculations affect the value of cotton, which figures largely in interstate commerce, and therefore constitute an obstruction to interstate commerce, and as an obstruction, while not constituting interstate commerce in itself, Congress, in the interest of interstate commerce, has a right to remove it, just as a sand bar in a navigable stream is not, of course, commerce, but is an obstruction to commerce, which Congress, under the power it has over interstate commerce, can remove. While this reasoning is of most doubtful validity, it does not apply to the bill before the Senate.

This bill does not purport to deal with anything except interstate commerce, does not attempt to prohibit dealing in futures as an obstruction to that commerce, but seeks to regulate such dealing on the theory that it is a part of interstate commerce. Contracts on the floor of an exchange are begun, carried through, and consummated in that exchange. No one but a member of the exchange can be a party to the contract. If the contract should happen to be made at the instance of one living in another State, such person is no party to the contract, but acts exclusively through and in the name of a member of the exchange. When he wires from another State to a member of the exchange to there make a contract for the sale or purchase of cotton to be delivered at a future time, such wire no more makes such contract interstate commerce than if he had wired an agent there to buy or sell a corner lot for him. Neither contract has any attribute of interstate commerce. But the matter is not one left open to question or to be established by reason in advance of adjudication on it by the courts. The direct question has been before and adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States. In Ware and Leland against Mobile County, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in April, 1908, and reported in volume 209, page 405, of the Supreme Court Reports, this precise question was before the court. It arose out of an attempt by the city of Mobile to levy a privilege tax upon cotton brokers located in that city, who resisted the tax on the ground that they were engaged in interstate commerce, that the business conducted by them consisted in taking orders from their customers in Mobile for the purchase or sale for future delivery of cotton, such orders to be executed by wire either in the New Orleans or the New York Cotton Exchange, and the agreed state of facts on which the case was tried showed that these contracts were settled on the exchanges by a payment of the difference between the value of the commodity as due when the contract was made and when it was closed out, or where the cotton was delivered on the contract, the customer being a purchaser, such cotton was delivered for him and held subject to his order in New Orleans or New York, and where he was a seller, sometimes the cotton was shipped in settlement of his contract from Alabama to New Orleans or New York. The agreed state of facts set out fully the nature of the business conducted by the defendants, and it was identically the kind of business sought to be reached by this bill.

The court said:

> The sole question here presented is whether the statute in question is an attempt to regulate interstate commerce; if the plaintiff in error is shown by the foregoing agreed facts to be engaged in interstate commerce, then the statute is viewed as an attempt by a State to regulate the commerce which the Constitution of the United States places within the exclusive control of the Federal Government.

The court reviewed its former decisions in the Lottery cases (188 U. S., 321) and the Telegraph cases (127 U. S., 640, and 105 U. S., 460) and the Insurance cases (8 Wall., 168; 155 U. S., 648; 178 U. S., 389) and, distinguishing the case then before it, said:

> But how stands the present case upon the facts stipulated—the appellants or brokers who take orders and transmit them to other States for the purchase and sale of grain or cotton upon speculation? They are in no sense common carriers of messages as are the telegraph companies, for that part of the transaction is purely speculative and followed by no actual delivery. It can not be fairly contended that such contracts are the subject of interstate commerce, and concerning such of the contracts for purchases for future delivery as result in actual delivery of the grain or cotton, the stipulated facts show that when the order is transmitted or received in a foreign State the property is bought in that State and there held for the purchaser. The transaction was thus closed by a contract completed and executed in the foreign State, although the orders were received from another State. When the delivery was upon a contract of sale made by the broker, the seller was at liberty to acquire the cotton in the market where the delivery was required or elsewhere. He did not contract to ship it from one State to the place of delivery in another State, and though it was stipulated that shipments were made from Alabama to the foreign State in some instances, that was not because of any contracted obligation so to do. In neither class of contracts, for sale or purchase, was there necessarily any movement of commodities in interstate traffic because of the contracts made by the brokers.

And the court holds that the brokers were not engaged in interstate commerce. Clearly, then, this bill would not affect a single transaction made upon the floor of an exchange. So far as these transactions are concerned, the bill, if enacted, would be neither beneficial nor injurious, merely harmless.

But there are contracts for future delivery of cotton not on the floor of exchanges perfectly legitimate, the making of which is contrary to no law of morals or equity, which are either prevented by this bill or forbidden under the penalties prescribed in it. A producer of cotton can, and they frequently do, make one or two classes of contracts where the cotton is quoted at what seems to be to such producer a profitable price on the exchange. He has the right to go and sell the cotton which he thinks he will make, and when the time for delivery comes to deliver all of his crop on such contract, the delivery being on the basis of middling cotton, and he being allowed that price for such portion of his crop as is middling and an additional price, according to the differences fixed by the exchange, for such portion as is better than middling, and a less price, according to the differences fixed by the exchange, for such portion as may not be as good as middling, but all of his cotton, whatever may be the grade, can be delivered on the contract.

This bill would prohibit the making of any such contract because such farmer would have to specify how much of his cotton was of each grade, and that it would be impossible for him to do, as the grades of the cotton would be determinable absolutely by the weather conditions existing when the cotton was gathered and prior to that time and, therefore, he would be unwilling to make a contract for the delivery of a specific number of bales of a certain grade not knowing whether he could comply with it. An absolutely legitimate contract is thus by this bill made impossible.

Again, it is not an uncommon kind of a contract for a planter to make to sell the first hundred or first thousand bales of cotton which he expects to raise on a given tract of land for actual delivery to a broker at the price agreed upon between them, the cotton to be delivered as ginned. This is a perfectly valid contract in the interest of the producer to be permitted to make, and yet such a contract could not be made because no grades would be specified.

Again, hundreds of thousands of bales of cotton are contracted for by spinners, the contracts made with cotton buyers, the spinner contracting for the purchase of such cotton as he may need for his mill and of the particular kind and grade that his business requires. He does not wish any other grade and probably handles only that grade for which he has contracted, and this grade the buyer is willing to undertake to deliver to him at the time and for the price stipulated. It is absolutely essential to the successful conduct of the business of the spinner that he should thus be able to contract for what he needs, yet under this bill the spinner could be compelled to accept not what he contracted for, but within one grade above or below the grade specified, thus rendering the very purpose of the contract nugatory.

The bill leaves undone those things which it seeks to do and does those things which its author never intended, and there is absolutely no health in it. It is not remarkable that such a bill has been favored by no one interested in the cotton business, whether as producer, buyer, spinner, or speculator, in any hearing had before the committee that reported it or before any other congressional committee at any time. I wish, however, to pass from the consideration of this particular bill to that of antioption bills as they are called generally. While I do not think this bill will be seriously pressed upon the consideration of the Senate, there are many who earnestly believe that the exchanges should be abolished or that speculation should be eliminated from the dealings on the exchanges, and such a measure is now pending here, having passed the House.

I would go a step further, however, and say that even if this bill is constitutional and accomplishes that which it seeks to accomplish, namely, requires the delivery as to contracts made on the exchanges of cotton not more than one grade above or below that contract, I could still oppose it as vicious legislation necessarily destructive of the exchanges; that is, of all future dealings on the exchanges. On all exchanges commodities are deliverable at the pleasure of the seller, the option being given to him either to deliver the commodity contracted for or to settle on the day of delivery by paying the difference between the value of the article contracted for when the contract was made and the day of delivery. This rule is made because it is conceded that conditions may arise under which the seller may not be able to carry out his contract or, if able to do so at all only at a great pecuniary loss, and that unless he is given this option he will not undertake to sell; and, of course, if there be no sellers there can be no buyers. This apparent advantage to the seller, of course, is not given to him because the buyer wishes to give him any advantage in dealing with him, but because he will not contract at all unless it is conceded to him, and this right is given him under the existing rules of the exchange where he is permitted to deliver cotton a number of grades above or below middling cotton, which is the basis of his contract. The proposed bill would require the seller to specify the grade, and gives him the privilege only of delivering one grade above or below that specified. The undoubted effect would be to prevent sellers from being willing to make contracts for future delivery. However much those buying might wish to have the particular cotton specified, it would avail them nothing if no one was willing to enter into such contracts. The idea of the bill, doubtless, is that it would tend to reduce fluctuations in the cotton market. It is perfectly evident that it would cause the widest of fluctuations. It is much easier to corner one or two particular grades of cotton than it is to corner a cotton crop, and when it was found that a number of contracts had been made for the delivery of a particular grade, especially if owing to weather conditions such grades should prove to be scarce as delivery time approached, the tendency on the part of speculators would be to buy up such grades and cause the sellers of such contracts to pay exorbitant prices for same in order that they might fill their contracts. This danger would be so evident that sellers would be unwilling to encounter it, would be unwilling to make the contracts as specified in the bill, and, as all other contracts would be unlawful, there would be no contracts thereafter made for future delivery. This, then, brings us to the consideration of the vital question and one much debated by men entertaining honest differences of opinion as to whether future contracts or contracts for the future delivery of cotton should be prohibited, supposing the Federal Government to have the power to prohibit same.

As I have said, this question has not been considered in 20 years by the United States Senate. Since that time the cotton crop of the United States has grown from 8,000,000 to more than 16,000,000 bales, worth practically this year at the prices for which it sold $900,000,000, of which in the neighborhood of $300,000,000 worth will be sold abroad, and that amount of money brought into the United States in exchange for it. While the cotton grower of the South is interested in legislation which might affect favorably or unfavorably his business, he is no more vitally concerned in it than the manufacturers of the East or than those who buy the manufactured goods throughout the United States. The question reaches as many people as any that has been up for the consideration of the Senate. It is in no sense a partisan or political question, but an economic question on which every Senator should vote according to what he believes to be the best interest of those affected after such a consideration of the question as its importance demands.

I want to discuss the purpose and object of cotton exchanges, their mode of doing business, and what regulation of that business the Federal Government should attempt.

Senator George, of Mississippi, in his speech in the Senate on the Hatch antioption bill—and it may be said in passing that this bill originated at a time when there was intense depression in the prices of agricultural products, which then was attributed in part to the adverse influence of the exchanges on such prices, and in still greater part to the demonetization of silver—stated the argument against the exchanges so clearly that nothing has been added to this argument by the opponents of the exchanges since that time. He contended, first, that the business of dealing in futures was in the control of a few hundred people in New York and New Orleans who "have the power independent of the great law of supply and demand to fix prices for themselves"; second, that they sold from four to seven times as much cotton for future delivery as the whole crop of the United States, and the necessary effect of such sales was to depress prices; third, that while future sales on the exchanges are made on the basis of middling cotton, uniform sales of futures are made every day at a lower price than the value of middling on that day; fourth, that hedges and all other dealings in futures are carried on at the expense of the producer; fifth, that future dealings caused wide fluctuations, which tended to disturb and unsettle the market for spot cotton.

The ablest argument against the bill made in the Senate was made by Senator White, of Louisiana, now Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and little can be added to the force of that argument, except that the data which has been compiled and the experience of the cotton world acquired in the 20 years since that speech was made fortifies its argument and verifies the correctness of its conclusions. In opening the argument Senator White declared that in his judgment there had been before the American Congress for years no more pernicious, no more vicious, no more flagrantly unconstitutional legislation, no legislation more tending to undermine and destroy the very foundations of our Government, and none more calculated to do untold and untellable harm to the people of this great country.

The second section of that bill defined futures to be a contract where one selling at the time of the sale is not the actual owner of the property, however real may be his intention to deliver at the time stipulated and however great may be his means of fulfillment; Senators while discussing the measure said that the contract aimed at was a lawful contract held to be valid before every court in the land; that by repeated adjudications of the highest courts it had been crystallized in our jurisprudence; that it was absolutely as lawful for a man to sell for future delivery as to sell for present delivery, provided that either of the parties to the contract has the honest intent to make or demand delivery, and he made the following quotations from writers of economics as showing the character of these exchanges aimed at by the bill:

> It is a singular fact that markets (or exchanges) have been a subject of popular prejudice and moral objection almost in proportion to the perfection with which they economize time, transportation, and effort and equalize prices. A market arises into its highest efficiency and value when it concentrates into one focus so large a portion of buyers and sellers of a certain commodity as to become, in conjunction with one or two other markets of the same kind, an authoritative standard of prices of the articles in which it deals for all buyers and sellers throughout the world. By aid of the quick intelligence which the telegraph supplies and of the swift transportation which steam affords the whole world is thus converted into one market having one price, subject to only the cost of transportation of the product between the point for which the price is quoted and all other points.

Concerning these exchanges Prof. Jevons says:

> The theoretical conception of a perfect market is more or less completely carried out in practice. It is the work of brokers in any extensive market to organize exchanges so that every purchase shall be made with the most thorough acquaintance of the conditions of the trade. Each broker strives to gain the best knowledge of the conditions of supply and demand and the earliest intimation of any change. He is in communication with as many other traders as possible, in order to have the widest range of information and the greatest chance of making suitable exchanges. It is only thus that a definite market price can be ascertained at every moment and varied according to the frequent news capable of affecting buyers and sellers. By the mediation of a body of brokers a complete consensus is established and the stock of every seller or the demand of every buyer brought into the market.

This is a description by writers of unquestioned ability in their field and who must be held to be without bias on this question. As to the nature of the market afforded by the exchanges at which antioption bills are aimed, he presented as a part of his speech a persistent, consistent, and a universal declaration of all of the important commercial bodies in this country, including the leading bankers, against the bill then before the Senate, and it may be proper to say here that there has been no change in this protest from all of the great commercial bodies of the United States who are affected by measures of this kind against their passage. He demonstrated the falsity of two of the most important contentions then and to-day of those who would destroy the exchanges, namely, that the sale of many times the amount of cotton raised necessarily depressed the prices and that by reason of future dealing the fluctuations in the prices were more frequent and wild.

The actual figures of the prices taken from the daily quotations and put in the RECORD by him show that the greater the number of sales in proportion to the amount of cotton raised the higher the price of cotton. The mere fact that where a crop of 10,000,000 bales is raised a hundred million bales was sold during the year on the exchanges proves absolutely nothing. In the first place, the actual cotton as it passed from the tenant to the landlord, from the landlord to the country merchant, from him to the cotton buyer, and from him to the spinner was probably sold five times. Fifty million bales of cotton were not sold, but ten millions sold five times over. It is not at all surprising that the number of sales made, consisting of transfers and resales of the same contract, should run up into many millions more, but without effect on price, because for every seller there is a buyer, and again, each seller either becomes, when the time of delivery approaches, a buyer in the future market or a buyer of spot cotton in order to enable him to carry out his contract, and in either event the effect is to maintain the price. This argument, most frequently heard, seems to be absolutely without merit. The figures used also show that the more active the market the narrower the fluctuations, which is demonstration of what is seen every day in the stock market. A stock that is being constantly dealt in is not nearly as apt to fluctuate widely as one where the transactions in it are few. A few purchasers may put an inactive stock up or a few sales put it down a number of points. Not so where there are many buyers or sellers for a stock. I will put in the RECORD the figures used by him in this connection.

Again, from the actual quotations of the prices in cotton from 1850 to 1860, a period when there were no future dealings in cotton, and from 1880 to 1890, a period when there were future dealings, it appears that the fluctuations in any given month were on the average not as great since future dealings have obtained as in the period when there were no such future dealings. The figures constitute a mathematical demonstration of the incorrectness of the widely current idea that the market would be comparatively stable but for future transactions. Further, these figures show that while there is a small decline in the market usually when the cotton begins to come in that the rate of decline is less than it was when no futures obtained. What was true then, namely, that the business of the planters of cotton was largely predicated on contracts for future delivery, has become true in a more universal sense now. The entire cotton trade, not only of the United States but of the world, is carried on by means of future contracts. The manufacturer of cotton goods contracts for the delivery of them for a period extending over 18 months and more and necessarily has to arrange for the corresponding purchases of his raw material for a similar period. He would not dare to make a contract which involved the purchase of cotton 12 months off without knowing the price at which that cotton could be bought. The course of dealing and the part played in it by the exchanges can be illustrated in this way:

A manufacturer of cotton goods has an offer for the purchase of goods to be delivered at the end of 12 months, the price to be paid being fixed and the amount of goods involving 1,000 bales of the raw material. Before he can tell whether he can accept the offer he ascertains or he endeavors to contract with a cotton buyer for the delivery to him at that time of a thousand bales of cotton of the grade required to fill his contract and at a price which will offer him a margin of profit. The buyer, for illustration, contracts to sell for him a thousand bales of middling cotton at nine and a half cents, which price enables the manufacturer to contract for the goods at a profit to himself. The buyer, however, is unwilling to carry the risk. It would be extremely hazardous for him to have outstanding a contract of several thousand bales of cotton at nine and a half cents with no knowledge of what he would be compelled to pay for it, so he protects himself by going into the future market and buying a thousand bales of cotton for the month when he contracted to deliver it, the price at which he buys, say 9 cents, leaving him a margin for his commission. Thus he eliminates the extra hazard from his contract, of course, eliminating with it the chance for a large profit, contenting himself with his commission. The handlers of the actual cotton, the man who buys it from the farmer and the manufacturer who buys it from him both have eliminated any unusual hazard from their business and can therefore afford to do that business at a narrower margin of profit, even pay to the producer a better price for his stuff. What, then, has become of the risk which was necessarily incident to the sale of a commodity which has not yet been produced? It is carried by the speculator, the man who, on the exchange, sold to this cotton buyer the thousand bales of cotton. This is the purpose served by the speculators. They carry the risk. They are virtually the insurers of the men with whom they deal. They constitute a class who study crop conditions, weather conditions, and supply and demand throughout the entire world and, endowed with business acumen and ability, they are willing to back their judgment as to what will be the future range of prices of agricultural products.

The cotton buyer, to follow further the transactions selected as an illustration, who has bought this thousand bales of future cotton to protect himself, does not expect to accept delivery on that contract, because the cotton delivered on that contract will, little of it, be of the grade which he has contracted himself to deliver; but when the cotton season rolls around he goes into the country and buys actual cotton, usually having to buy cotton in block lots containing only a percentage of what he needs on his contract. As he acquires actual cotton he sells proportionately his insurance contract in the exchange until he has finally acquired his thousand bales of spot cotton. He then delivers his spot cotton and closes out his future contract. If spot cotton has gone up, he has lost money on his spot contract but made the corresponding amount on his future contract, or vice versa; but, in either event, there is the margin of profit in commissions left to him on his spot sale. He has conducted a perfectly legitimate trade. He has avoided the element of unusual risk by hedging his spot sale by a purchase in the future market. This course of business obtains universally; nine-tenths of the cotton which is handled to-day in the markets of the world is handled in this way.

There are two most signal advantages accruing to the cotton producer by this system: First, the fact that the cotton buyer can protect himself from unusual hazard by hedging his contract enables thousands of buyers throughout the country to do business on a comparatively small capital. They are enabled where they have no orders from the mills for the cotton to buy cotton wherever the price seems to them to be profitable and to protect themselves in a large measure against loss by hedging. The banks are willing to advance to them the money to handle this cotton because they are protected by such future contracts, but those banks would be absolutely unwilling to give these buyers credit so as to enable them to handle cotton if they had to take the risk of that cotton declining while still in the buyers' hands. This practice obtains generally in this country—universally in England. Destroy the cotton buyer's ability to hedge and you destroy him as a buyer. Thousands of independent buyers throughout the country would be placed where they could only buy when they had orders in their hands for the cotton from the spinners. There is no agricultural product on the earth that has the same active market, the same number of buyers distributed throughout the world, as cotton. Under the present system there is not a point in the world where ten bales of cotton can be gotten together where there will not be a buyer for it and a buyer whose price will be fairly close considering the cost of transportation and the prices of that commodity on that day on the great exchanges of the world. Destroy this system and the buyers would become simply the representatives of the spinners. Combination among these spinners would be infinitely easier than among the thousands of independent buyers to-day where the competition is such as to make combination impossible, and this tendency to combine would be accentuated by the fact that with the exchanges destroyed only the larger spinners could continue to do business, only those who had capital enough to be able to carry large quantities of spot cotton throughout the season, and beyond doubt these large spinners would soon form combinations affecting prices.

A bill which destroys exchanges should be called a bill in the interest of, and to promote trusts among, the spinners at the expense of the farmers. A second, and I conceive a great benefit to the producers from the present system, is the support ofttimes given to prices by the speculators. There are two contending forces which, in the absence of speculation, fix the price of cotton. On the one hand, there is organized wealth represented by the great spinners of the world, who are forever trying to purchase their raw material at the lowest price possible. Their every effort is to depress the price so as to leave a wider margin of profit to themselves. Opposed to these are the farmers, disorganized to-day, disorganized in the past, and forever to be a disorganized body of men, struggling to get by individual effort the best price possible for their commodity, and always forced to sell a large proportion of that crop as soon as it has been gathered. Practically two-thirds of every cotton crop, by reason of the obligations which have been incurred in the making of this most expensive crop through a period of 11 months, must be sold as gathered, and the lower the price the greater the quantity that must be sold. To-day between these disorganized farmers and these organized spinners stand the great speculative class willing to buy when cotton seems cheap and to sell when cotton seems dear—free lances in the world of trade.

True, they frequently sell, but they have not the fixed object in view which the spinners have, to depress the price of the commodity, and whenever cotton seems so low as to under all conditions make the price attractive, these speculators representing great organized wealth come in and buy that cotton because they believe they can make the spinners pay a greater price for it than that at which they buy it, and so, through selfish interests, they constitute not infrequently an invaluable ally for the farmer. This was illustrated in handling the last crop of 1911–12—a crop of 16,000,000 bales—which everyone thought would depress the price down to or below 8 cents. It has been disposed of with unparalleled rapidity at an average price of 11 cents, and the decline to 8 cents was undoubtedly prevented by the speculators, who, acquainted with trade conditions throughout the world, began to buy cotton at 9 cents, believing that they could, as they have since done, sell that cotton to the spinners at a profit. No one who studied conditions can have any doubt that but for this speculative class who would not have dealt in spot cotton the crop would have sold for a figure so much below that for which it did sell as to make a difference of many millions of dollars. Destroy this present system and the most earnest advocates of the destruction of the exchanges admit that the cotton trade will have to be revolutionized, that some great warehouse system will have to be inaugurated with capital enough to handle the spot cotton for the farmers in such a way as not to make a glut of cotton on the market. During the years that will elapse probably before the formation of such an organization a lower range of prices must prevail, and what is there that will lead anyone to suppose that such an organization will not be controlled for the selfish interests of the men who put the capital in it and for the benefit of the farmer. Any advantage from it is purely fanciful and chimerical, but the evils that will flow from the destruction of the present system are substantial and unquestioned. Once again the farmer would be doing as he has been accustomed to do—drop the bone in order to grasp the shadow.

The Hatch antioption bill did not become a law. There followed, however, two comparatively large cotton crops, at that time record-breaking crops, in 1897 and 1898, and cotton sold below 6 cents, the lowest price on record except in 1842 and 1845. Again the attention of Congress was directed to the distressed condition of agriculture, and for the purpose of ascertaining the causes and seeking some remedy for it, in June, 1898, an act was passed creating what was known as the industrial commission, composed of 5 Senators, 5 Members of the House, and 10 economic experts. It was charged with the duty of investigating the questions pertaining to immigration, labor, agriculture, manufacturing, and business, and to report to Congress suggesting such legislation as it deemed advisable. A part of that report made in 1901 deals with the distribution of agricultural products and the effect of future dealings on the prices of such products. It might be proper to say here that in 1895 the Department of Agriculture in Bulletin No. 9 made a report as to the effect of the cotton exchanges in causing fluctuations in prices, and that report corroborated the figures used by Senator White, bringing them down to a later date and showing that the fluctuations continued to be less with the exchanges in existence than at the period previous thereto. The report of this commission is highly instructive, demonstrating the value of the exchanges and the important functions discharged by the speculative class, and in reference to this uses the following language:

The answer is that it has been found best for the producing and consuming interests of the community that the risks of distribution should be localized in a separate commercial class whose members are in a position to inform themselves of all the factors, past, present, and prospective, affecting the future course of prices. If the risks of distribution fell upon the farmer, it would increase materially the risks of capital required and thus raise the rate of interest he should have to pay as producer, because increased risks always raise the rate of interest. This would increase the cost of production and consequently tend to reduce consumption by rise of price to consumers. Such rise of price beyond a certain point would reduce the volume of trade. If consumers assumed the risks of distribution there would be very inadequate provision for the future. Irregular supply of subsistence soon breaks down the economic efficiency of consumers, besides impairing their regular consuming capacity as customers of the producer. Hence the community—producers, traders, and consumers—all suffer together. Regularity in supply of the means of subsistence is a great desideratum in economic welfare, but it is so automatic a process that we really do not know how it is accomplished. The work is done through the medium of a market price; a higher price brings forth more, a lower price brings forth less. Now it is the speculator who has to decide in advance on the price at which a regular supply will in all probability be forthcoming from producers in sufficient quantity to meet the regular requirements of the consumer. One speculator might place the future market price too high, another too low, but as a class they correct and check one another. It is to their interest as distributors to call forth all that the consumer will take, and no more. Speculators as a class are, therefore, interested primarily in a correct judgment, as much so as is either the producer or the consumer of the product in which the trader speculates.

And sums up the services of this speculative class to the cotton industry as follows:

1. They localize industrial risks among a commercial class whose special function it is to distribute surplus supplies over deficit times and places in such a way as to lessen the uncertainty of producers and consumers.
2. They relieve producers and consumers from carrying a whole year's stock, enabling the former to convert his crop promptly into cash capital and the latter to supply himself as his periodical needs may require without enhancing prices beyond the ordinary rate of risks and returns of such capital investments.
3. Competition of speculative dealers tends more than any other force to reduce profits of these agencies to a minimum per unit of commodity handled. Released from other economic functions it is to their interests to seek to reduce the risks of their distribution to a minimum. By expert acquaintance with conditions that involve risks the hazardous elements are gradually limited, if not entirely eliminated.

This commission exploded, too, the fallacy frequently heard that the future price is always less than the spot price. Of course, the future price of to-day on the board is less than the spot price of the current month owing to the expense involved in the selection of a number of bales of cotton of the same grade, the cotton on the future contract being delivered covering a number of grades. This difference should about represent this trouble and expense and should be about 25 points. For reasons which I hereafter note, it is, especially in New York, frequently greater, but the test is whether the price, say, of October cotton in July is uniformly less than the price in the month of October. In other words, is the tendency of the speculation to put the price down?

The investigation of the commission shows that out of 57 different futures compared with the spot prices realized in the New York market, covering a period from 1881 to 1899, in 29 cases the future prices were higher than the spots realized three months later, and in 28 cases the future prices were lower than the spots; that is, the speculative judgment anticipated the realized value of cotton a little too favorably in half of the cases and not quite favorably enough in the other half. In the Liverpool market, out of 57 cases, in 30 cases the future prices were lower than the spot prices realized at maturity of the contract and in 27 cases they were higher. In the New Orleans market, out of 57 cases, in 25 of them the future price was lower than the spot price realized and in 32 of them the future price was higher. These results show that, in the long run, the speculative quotations for future delivery are neither uniformly above nor below the level of the cash value of the cotton at the time of the delivery. They are merely tentative anticipations of what that value will be. They do not fix the value; the effort is to foresee the value.

This same subject of future dealing in agricultural products as affecting the price of such products has been carefully considered in recent articles by eminent economists. Prof. S. S. Huebner, professor of insurance and commerce, University of Pennsylvania, in September, 1911, wrote an article entitled "The functions of produce exchanges," and Prof. Carl Parker, of the Columbia University, of New York, "The governmental regulation of speculation." It would be difficult to say what bias these eminent men could have in the consideration of this question from an economic standpoint. Their conclusions are just along the lines indicated above. They believe that the exchanges serve a most useful instrumentality in commerce. But certainly the most exhaustive examination ever made into this question was made by the Department of Commerce and Labor through Herbert Knox Smith, of the Bureau of Corporations, acting under a resolution of the House of Representatives of April 20, 1908. Three volumes are devoted to the operations of the exchanges and the effect on prices. The result of this exhaustive and scientific investigation made at the instance of Congress by one of the most highly trained of the experts in the employ of the Government may be shown on page 25 of the summary, Part IV.

Speaking, first, of the prejudice against future sales, he attributes it to the failure to appreciate these fundamental facts: (1) That every short sale means a purchase at the same time; otherwise there could be no sale. (2) Every short sale eventually means a subsequent purchase by the original seller. (3) The important fact that speculators seldom undertake deliberately to defy natural conditions. As a rule they are anxious to shape their campaigns in accordance with such conditions.

Furthermore, there is usually great division of opinion among influential speculators, almost never complete unanimity of opinion. The prices fixed by speculation, therefore, are usually the result of exceedingly keen competition. In summing the matter up, he states:

The future system when properly conducted unquestionably tends within certain narrow limits to increase the price paid the producer, and this, moreover, without advancing the price to the spinner. This beneficial result of the system is chiefly due to the fact that the hedging system, if properly operated, reduces the risk to cotton merchants. This reduction of risk is done in view of the keen competition which exists in the future market and forces the cotton merchant to reduce his charges for handling the crop. This benefit, however, is dependent upon the proper conduct of the system.

He adds:

It is true, too, that price movements in cotton have been somewhat steadier, broadly speaking, since the future system was inaugurated than they formerly were—

And he takes the prices of spot middling cotton for a period of 33 years, from 1828 to 1860, and compares the fluctuations with the 33 years ending in 1909 and deduces the conclusion in this comparison that a decidedly steadier movement of prices since the future system was established obtains than prior to such establishment. If there be an economic writer of any repute who has investigated the subject and promulgated a different conclusion, I am not aware of it. The consensus of opinion among those dealing in cotton—excluding for the present the producer—among those furnishing the money to handle this great staple, and among the writers who from a purely scientific standpoint have investigated the subject, is that the destruction of the exchanges would be calamitous; that the chief sufferers therefrom would be the producers of cotton; that the revolutionizing of the present system of handling cotton; with its ramifications throughout the world would ensue; and, further, every evil which exists under the present system would still exist, as the operations of exchanges in every other country but ours would necessarily be unaffected by our legislation.

What is there opposed to this array of intelligence? It is the cry of the farmers' unions throughout the South to-day, "Away with gambling in cotton," because of the belief entertained by them that thereby prices are injuriously affected. For the opinion of the farmers on a subject in which they are so vitally concerned, reached after a thorough investigation and with due deliberation, I should entertain the profoundest respect; for this slogan, promulgated throughout the years and which is a mere parrotlike repetition of a cry of 20 years ago, when the price of all agricultural products was depressed, I entertain no respect. I do not believe there has been six hours' intelligent consideration of this subject by all the farmers' unions in the United States in a quarter of a century. I have no desire to belittle the accomplishments, whatever they may be, of these unions. If they have wrought great good, they have done it by stealth. So far as what has been accomplished is known to the world there is not an agricultural college in the United States—I would go further and say there never has been an agricultural expert sent out by the United States Government, a single one—who has not done more for the cause of agriculture than every farmers' union in existence. What they ask for commands respect, not because of the intelligence of the request, but because of the voting strength of the unions, and they vote as they are directed to vote by those whom they have elected as their officers, and who, instead of instructing them in agriculture, direct their politics. The first ones to suffer from the abolition of the exchanges would be this very class of men, who are not in a position to protect themselves, and their representatives who bring about that suffering through their votes will not be spared censure therefrom merely because they have obeyed the insistent and unanimous clamor of the unions.

There are grave abuses in the exchanges, which are in a measure doubtless responsible for the continued demands for their abolition; and while I am inclined to believe that the evil flowing from their abolition is greater than that flowing from the present abuses, yet that such abuses are grave and may possibly justly be corrected by legislation, the exchanges showing no willingness to alter their rules, is undoubted.

The two principal evils in the exchanges which affect disastrously the handlers of spot cotton are: (1) The privilege of the seller to tender on his contract lower grades than there is a general market for; (2) the right under the rules of the New York Cotton Exchange to tender these grades not at the commercial difference in value obtaining at the time between the grade tendered and middling cotton but at an arbitrarily fixed difference in value agreed upon by a committee of the exchange, which difference does not necessarily represent at all the real difference when fixed and which oftentimes varies widely thereafter from the real difference. These evils are clearly pointed out and denounced by Mr. Herbert Knox Smith in his report. The market is depressed through the operations of them in this way: The man who has bought a future contract when the time for delivery approaches finds himself confronted with the danger of having delivered to him on that contract a grade of cotton known as good ordinary under the rules of the New York exchange, which is a grade below good ordinary according to the Government standard. It is frequently a grade for which there is a little demand and which the buyer does not want because he can neither use it in his business nor readily find a purchaser for it. Again, this cotton, under the fixed difference rule, is delivered to him at a value which does not represent its commercial value; at a value frequently above that commercial value. For illustration, his contract calls for 10-cent middling cotton. Instead of middling cotton being given him on his contract good ordinary, worth 8 cents in the market, is given him, and at a value of 9 cents fixed arbitrarily by the rules of the exchange, the effect of which is to cause him to lose $5 a bale on the cotton delivered to him, as he can only sell it at 8 cents. This causes him a loss which he usually guards against in advance by bidding less for the contract than the real value of middling cotton, thus dragging down the market quotation for middling cotton, and this is why the quotations on the New York exchange are frequently much below instead of normally below the quotations for spot cotton in the current month.

Again, the price of cotton throughout the United States is affected by it being quoted on the great exchanges of the country at a price below its real value. It affects the price of the spot commodity, first, by its psychological effect. The holders of cotton seeing this quotation less than value day after day are prone to value less that which they hold, and so with those who are seeking to buy it.

Again, cotton is bought habitually by buyers throughout the country by orders so much on or off a given future quotation, and if that quotation gets where it is abnormally low and does not represent the true value often before instructions to these buyers are changed large quantities of cotton are bought at an unfairly low price. Again, a cotton exchange is a thermometer which should reflect the true conditions as to the spot cotton, and a thermometer which habitually registers a false temperature is a worthless instrument. True, the value of the exchange as a hedging market is seriously impaired by these rules and its value as a market for the delivery of cotton under its future contracts almost destroyed.

The defense made by those who advocate the right to deliver this low cotton is that a market is thereby afforded it. They overlook the fact that in offering a market for a very small percentage—less than 10 per cent—of a normal crop, and that the worst of that crop, they adopt a rule which tends to drag down the price of the entire crop and which subjects the producer to millions of dollars of loss. It is true only a limited amount of this low cotton can be delivered on these contracts, but the price of the whole is affected, because any purchaser is liable to have this cotton delivered to him, and he guards against it in the price that he makes when he buys the contract.

Can these evils be remedied by legislation? If so, are they grave enough to warrant such legislation? They can be remedied by taxing each contract on the floor of the exchange—imposing a Federal tax on same, prohibitive in its nature, and then providing that where such contract specifies on its face that no cotton below good ordinary, according to the Government standard, shall be delivered on it, and that the difference in value between the cotton other than middling delivered on such a contract shall be the commercial difference ascertained by the exchange not less than six days before the date of delivery, thus permitting contracts which correct the evils complained of—that is, do not embody them—to be exempt from such tax. Unquestionably, an evil should be a grave one to be reached by the taxing power. This can be constitutionally reached, in my judgment, in no other manner. It affects the price of a staple raised in 11 States, no bale of which is raised in the State in which this exchange is carried on. The people who produce this great staple, through their own State laws, are unable to touch the evil complained of. The exchange has through years refused to correct them itself. The sole relief must be found in Congress, and until corrected the clamor for the abolition and destruction of these exchanges will be unceasing.

The Filipino People Ask Justice.

SPEECH

OF

HON. MANUEL L. QUEZON,

OF PHILIPPINE ISLANDS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 13, 1913.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 28607) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, after listening to two of the most brilliant gentlemen in this House for nearly two hours speaking with absolute self-assurance of the country where I was born and have lived all my life, I feel that I have lost my country because I can not find it. I do not recognize from their description the Archipelago of the Philippines, nor can I identify in what they have said the Filipino people—my own people. Far be it from me to harbor the slightest thought of charging these wise and distinguished gentlemen with deliberate purpose to misinform the House. I know them both well and have for neither anything but the highest regard and respect. They have merely conveyed to the House in the very best of faith their own misinformation.

Some time ago I heard the story of a friar who lived for 70 years and then died in the Philippine Islands.

As a preacher he went from town to town mingling with the people of all classes, living with them in their own houses and eating their food. He spoke their language. With all these opportunities he devoted himself to the study of the characteristics of the Filipino people for the purpose of writing a book on this subject. When he died a large volume was found in his bedroom inscribed with these words, "My Knowledge of the Filipino People." Those who first saw the book were greatly pleased. Knowing the qualifications of the author, they anticipated that the work would be a valuable contribution to knowledge. There would appear, they thought, with its lights and shadows, the life of a new country. Eagerly they opened the volume. But what a disappointment! Not a line was written there. And yet in those blank pages spoke plainly as well as eloquently the wisdom of a student. That is one story. Here is another in contrast to it. There are gentlemen who devote 5, 10, or even 30 minutes of their time to reading a small part of a report. At most they will make a flying trip through the islands for 10, 15, or 30 days, admire the beautiful scenery of my country, "take a look" at my people, without mingling with them, without listening to the words that their hearts and their minds would speak, and then proceed to say, "I know all about the Philippines." [Applause and laughter.]

And they want you, Mr. Chairman, to take them as authorities on things Philippine. It is often true that after we have read something in print about a country or have seen a part of it, we feel satisfied that we may with authority speak of that country. When we do so speak, when in speaking we use our own language, our mastery of a tongue which we have used from our childhood gives the advantage of presenting our ideas so brilliantly that we impress our audience with the belief that we really know of what we are talking. [Laughter and applause.]

Ah, Mr. Chairman, you may read the history of a country and learn it by heart. You may know its statistics; the extent of the population; what proportion of its people can read and write, and how many can speak this, that, or the other language; how much they sell and produce; but to know the people, their characteristics, capabilities, and shortcomings, is not necessarily to know their numbers, their literacy, or their internal or foreign trade. To know a people you must not only live with them for a number of years, but share their feelings, possess a sympathy for their aspirations, and, most important of all, be broad minded enough to abandon race prejudice and fixed views on the superiority of one civilization over another. You must be so elastic as to take the place of those whom you are studying, and from their points of view consider their life and deeds. This is emphatically true in the case of any occidental country when studied by an occidental. But it is very much more true in the case of an oriental people because of the infinitely greater difficulty an occidental finds in knowing them. There is not as yet any American who has the qualifications I have mentioned to express an opinion about the Philippines. The high authorities on things Philippine cited by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] are, as we shall demonstrate presently, altogether lacking in those qualifications.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. How many years did the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] live in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. QUEZON. I understand he went there on a short trip—perhaps a month.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Only one month?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, I thought he had lived there for some years.

Mr. QUEZON. Oh, never.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman tell us how long the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] was there?

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, what I say about the Philippines and the Filipinos is not based upon the authority of the gentleman from Virginia; it is based upon my own authority. I want to tell the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] that I was born in the Philippine Islands, that I have lived there all of my life, that I have studied my country, and that I have studied my people. I have devoted my life to their service, and I shall do so as long as God gives me breath. [Applause.]

Having said so much by way of introduction, I shall now proceed to answer specifically the statements of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD]. But let us remember, lest it may be forgotten, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has admitted, in answer to a question I put to him in the course of his remarks, that he has never been in the Philippines, and he will admit, I think, that he has not devoted a great deal of his time to the study of Philippine questions. As for the gentleman from New York, his personal knowledge can not be more than "impressions" obtained from a short and flying trip which he has made to the islands.

Curiously enough, the statements made and arguments presented by both of these gentlemen are in cases similar and in others absolutely identical. With only two exceptions, to which I shall presently refer, the speech of the gentleman from New York is either textually or in thought contained in the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. This last being the more extensive and elaborate of the two, I shall address myself mainly to it.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE BILL.

The first part of the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was devoted to a brief discussion of the bill now pending before the House, H. R. 22143, entitled "A bill to establish a qualified independent government for the Philippines and to fix the date when such qualified independence shall become absolute and complete, and for other purposes."

He calls this bill "remarkable and dangerous." I shall not occupy the time of the House at present in discussing the merits of this bill. I hope it will soon be brought up for discussion, and with all the power at my command I shall then support it. Just now I wish merely to say that the people of the Philippines have approved it. The Philippine Assembly has passed a resolution unanimously indorsing it, which is as follows:

[Third Philippine Legislature, first session, Vds.]

Assembly resolution 61, introduced by the committee on relations with the sovereign country, with report (A. Rept. No. 64), December 10, 1912, in lieu of proposed resolutions 5, 6, and 19, introduced by Delegates Romualdez, Singson, and De León, respectively, and adopted by the assembly December 10, 1912.

A resolution expressing adhesion to the Jones bill on Philippine independence and petitioning the Congress of the United States for the speedy approval thereof.

Whereas the Representative for Virginia, Hon. WILLIAM A. JONES, on March 20 of this year introduced in the House of Representatives of the United States a bill providing for the immediate granting to the Philippines of a qualified independence which will operate during eight years of organization prior to the definitive declaration of the complete and absolute independence of said islands;

Whereas said bill has been unanimously received by the entire Filipino people as an acknowledgment of its present right to govern itself for the liberty, peace, and prosperity of all and each of its inhabitants;

Whereas the Philippine Assembly, as the representatives of the Filipino people, is principally obliged to express what it believes to be the unanimous desire of the said people in a solemn and clear manner, that can not give rise to twisted interpretations: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Philippine Assembly, That it is the opinion of the assembly that the Jones bill contains those provisions which confirm and ratify conclusively the demands of the people, based on their present capacity to govern themselves, and that it is its sense that said bill completely closes the indefinite, absurd, and notoriously unpopular period of apprenticeship, against which the people have been protesting to this day, the Filipino Government created by said bill being given only the time necessary for studying, continuing, and completing the fundamental organization of the Filipino republic;

Resolved further, That the Congress and the President of the United States be, and they hereby are, petitioned through the Philippine Resident Commissioners in Washington to approve the Jones bill at this regular session of the Congress of the United States;

Resolved further, That in case the Jones bill can not be approved during said session the new President of the United States be, and he hereby is, petitioned that if a special session of Congress is called he recommend to it in his message the consideration of the aforesaid bill; and

Resolved, finally, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Resident Commissioners, the House of Representatives, the Senate, and the President of the United States.

Adopted December 10, 1912.

I hereby certify that the foregoing resolution (A. Res. 61) was adopted by the assembly on December 10, 1912.

TEODORO M. KALAW,
Secretary Philippine Assembly.

I have also in my possession copies of the resolutions passed by every municipality in the archipelago indorsing this bill.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE BILL.

I do not doubt that certain provisions of the bill may be improved. In fact, in the opinion of the Filipino people, it could, and would be improved by shortening the time within which absolute independence shall be granted. But the essential thing which makes the bill popular among the Filipinos is that it is a signal change from an indefinite, ambiguous, and obnoxious policy to an open, frank, and honest pledge of Philippine independence within a reasonable time and under wise safeguards.

DR. SCHURMAN ON THE INDEPENDENCE BILL.

As it may interest the gentleman from Pennsylvania to read the opinion of President Schurman, of Cornell University, on this bill, I shall print it in connection with my remarks. President Schurman, a Republican like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], has had the advantage—that the latter has not had—of knowing the Filipino people by personal contact, for he was in the Philippines a much longer time than the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD], and was charged, as chairman of the first Philippine Commission appointed by President McKinley, with the duty of investigating the conditions in the Philippines. Here is President Schurman's opinion:

I think no honest mind can carefully and impartially study this bill without recognizing it as a great piece of constructive statesmanship. It conserves the best interests both of the people of the United States and the people of the Philippine Islands, while at the same time it expresses loyalty to their highest political ideals and aspirations. And it minimizes the risk which is inseparable from every great legislative measure by establishing a period of probation and experiment before the final policy is irrevocably realized.

PERIOD OF ILLUSION IS OVER.

The period of illusion with regard to American sovereignty over the Philippine Islands has passed away. That sovereignty is no longer regarded by the American people as an advantage; they now know that in annexing the Philippines they assumed a heavy burden and a grave responsibility. This is not to say that the course followed by our Government in 1898 and 1899 was not the right course. I for one believe that no other policy could at that time have been properly and safely adopted. But the question before us to-day concerns not only our doings in the past, but our proposals for the present and the future. What shall we do with the Philippine Islands over which, as a matter of fact, American sovereignty now extends? They are not of financial advantage to the United States, but a disadvantage and a burden. And the continued enforcement of our sovereignty upon 7,000,000 civilized and Christian Filipinos is a defiance of their aspirations and a violation of our own political ideals and traditions.

The American people have never declared that they proposed to retain permanent control of the Philippine Islands. On the contrary, I believe it is the desire and the intention of the American people to relinquish sovereignty over the Philippine Archipelago just as soon as the Filipinos express their desire for independence and show their capacity for exercising it. The people of the Philippine Islands have already unanimously and repeatedly expressed their desire for independence. Their participation in the government of the islands since their cession to the United States strikingly evinces their capacity for self-government. But in order that further demonstration may be afforded, the bill under consideration proposes to give them the exclusive management of their own affairs, subject to veto of their legislation either by the President or the Congress of the United States, for a period of eight years during which, while the president of the Philippine Republic shall be appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate, all other officials of government—legislative, executive, and judicial—shall be elected or appointed by the Filipinos themselves or their duly constituted authorities. And during this probationary period all treaties and commercial conventions which the Philippine Government proposes to make with foreign powers shall be submitted to the President of the United States and by him to the Senate for their approval.

JONES BILL COVERS ALL POINTS.

Wise and statesmanlike legislation takes account not only of principles, but also of circumstances and actual conditions. The present bill admirably satisfies this test. If there are any advantages accruing to the United States from the exercise of sovereignty over the Philippine Islands, this bill provides that those advantages shall be retained by the United States after the islands have become independent. Americans are to have freedom of travel and access in the Philippines for business, pleasure, or missionary purposes. And they are to be protected and to enjoy the same advantages as shall be furnished the Filipinos themselves. No higher tax shall be levied upon their property, merchandise, or business than that payable by the Filipinos themselves under like circumstances. No citizens of other countries are ever to enjoy greater trade or other advantages in the Philippine Islands than those accorded to the citizens of the United States. Of course, the Government of the Philippines is to assume and carry into effect the treaty obligations contracted by the United States with the Kingdom of Spain in relation to the Philippine Islands. Important as these safeguards are, they do not complete the story. The most important provision is still to be mentioned. The bill provides that the United States are to have and retain control, ownership, and complete sovereignty over such lands and harborage waters as the American Government may deem necessary for coaling and naval stations and for terminal facilities for cables.

It is thus seen that under the terms of this bill all results that may be desired by the people of the United States are accomplished. In the first place, the people of the United States relieve themselves of the expense of maintaining a large army in the Philippine Islands and escape the grave danger of being involved in war on their account. In the second place, they show fidelity and loyalty to their own political ideals and institutions by recognizing the right of the Filipinos to govern themselves. In the third place, while relieving themselves of the burden of sovereignty over the Philippine Islands, the American people retain all the advantages of commerce and intercourse which ordinarily go with sovereignty. And in the fourth place, the strategical advantage which sovereignty over the Philippines is supposed to have conferred upon the United States is not lost or even impaired with the independence of the islands, for this bill grants in perpetuity to the United States the right to retain control, ownership, and complete sovereignty over such lands and harborage waters as are actually necessary for coaling and naval stations and convenient terminal points for cables.

There is another respect in which this bill shows not only loyalty to principle but regard for sentiment and even prejudices. I believe the overwhelming majority of the American people desire to see the Philippine people sovereign masters of their own destiny; they will not, however, on any condition, admit the Philippines as a State to the American Union; they would like, on the other hand, to see the Filipinos a self-governing, independent, and sovereign nation. If, however, they are asked to grant the Filipinos their independence, these same American people draw back and hesitate on the ground that the Filipinos may not be able to govern themselves.

CAPACITY OF FILIPINOS.

Unfortunately, interested parties, hostile to the best interests and aspirations of the Filipinos, have misrepresented to the American people their character, capacity, and conditions. Many, even well-informed Americans, have therefore come to believe that the Philippine population is made up largely of savages and barbarians who are steeped in ignorance and who would be at one another's throats if the restraints of American power were removed. But the census taken by the Americans themselves shows that of the 7,635,000 Filipinos in the archipelago in 1903, 6,987,000 were civilized and only 647,000 wild or uncivilized.

These civilized Filipinos are the only Christian nation in the Orient. I have often said that in culture, education, capacity, and governing ability the Filipinos may be compared with the people of Latin America. If they were granted their independence, they would not at once become a great nation, like the Argentine Republic or Brazil, but they would, in my opinion, take fair rank with the smaller countries of Central and South America. They have had the same sort of tutelage and training as the South American people. That is, they derive their civilization and religion and ideas of law and government from Spain. But in the case of the Filipinos there is the additional favoring circumstance that for 13 years they have now been under the beneficent tutelage of the United States, and during this period they have had much experience in local self-government, and the blessings of education have been widely diffused all over the archipelago. The report of the secretary of education for the year ending June 30, 1911, shows that the public-school enrollment for that year was 610,493, while the number of public schools in operation was 4,404 and the number of teachers 9,086, of whom 8,403, or over 92 per cent, were Filipinos.

PROBATIONARY PERIOD MEETS ALL OBJECTIONS.

The bill, however, recognizes that there is no complete answer to the doubt felt by so many people in the United States regarding the capacity of the Filipinos to govern themselves short of the answer of actual demonstration. It is proposed, therefore, that there shall be a probationary period of self-government and sovereignty during a period of eight years, qualified by a veto right in the President and Congress of the United States. This will give the Filipinos ample opportunity to demonstrate their capacity to manage their own affairs. It will also be for them a school of constantly enlarging self-government, finally expanding itself to independent and sovereign self-government. And when on the 4th day of July, 1921, the full and complete independence of the Philippines shall be acknowledged, the United States will thereafter have no responsibilities for the affairs of the Philippine people, and will have no obligation to defend them either against foreign invasion or internal disorder. The large army that we now maintain in the Philippines can be called home. The danger of Asiatic complications will be greatly reduced.

But can the Philippine Republic stand alone? The Filipinos, who are the best judges of the matter, think it can. If they are mistaken, the penalty falls on them and not on us. And it must be acknowledged that recent events in Asia make for the immunity of the Filipinos. A republic has been established in China, devoted to peace and modern civilization; if it fights at all, it will be in defense, not for purposes of aggression. Furthermore, Japan's victories both over China and Russia have shifted its center of gravity from the islands confronting the coast of Asia to the mainland. Its development for the future is not through the islands southward by way of Formosa, but on the mainland westward through Korea and Manchuria. And while Asiatic nations are thus drawn away from the Philippine Islands, there seems to be no European nation which would have special interest in annexation.

NEUTRALIZATION DESIRABLE.

The bill, however, proposes to give the Filipinos the best possible opportunity for maintaining their independence and national sovereignty, and an effective means of protection is at hand. How are the integrity and independence of Switzerland and Belgium maintained? As everyone knows, they are maintained by international neutralization. The bill accordingly provides that the President of the United States shall open negotiations with foreign Governments, including those of Great Britain, Germany, France, Russia, Japan, and Spain, with a view to securing the neutrality of the Philippine Islands and the recognition of their independence through international agreement.

I repeat, finally, that this bill offers the wisest, justest, and most statesmanlike solution of the Philippine problem which has yet been presented. It conserves all the material interests of the people of the United States and the islands. It embodies the political ideals of the American people and responds to the ardent aspirations of the people of the Philippines. Had such a measure been enacted into law earlier the United States would have had the honor and eternal glory of establishing the first republic in the Continent of Asia. Now that the Chinese people have anticipated our action, we ought not to delay in responding to their challenge to set up beside the big Republic of China the neighboring Republic of the Philippines. But whatever any other nation may do or not do, justice, honor, and true Americanism combine with national self-interest and expediency in prescribing that we should, without delay, permit the Filipinos to govern themselves and to set up within the next few years an independent and sovereign Philippine Republic.

JACOB GOULD SCHURMAN.

PHILIPPINE EXPLOITATION.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, under the heading "The Philippines not a bad bargain," spoke of the islands as "very rich possessions," and said that "if Germany or Japan or any other foreign nation possessed them they would never let them go." Then he proceeded to enumerate the number of acres of rich soil in the Philippines, to estimate how much population they could support, and to sketch their imports and exports. He ends his tale with this suggestive remark:

> Think of the vast possibilities if these people (the Filipinos) were taught modern methods and the use of modern implements so as to make the most of their land, and think of the vast trade and of the vast market for our products when those islands shall become more densely populated, as they are destined to be when intelligent methods of agriculture shall prevail over their now untouched millions of acres.

I am glad to find the gentleman from Pennsylvania treading in this path. For once I am face to face with the argument that independence should never be granted to the Philippines for reasons very much at variance with altruistic purposes. It is true that after saying all this the gentleman hastens to disclaim any purpose of "making an argument in favor of the permanent retention of the Philippines," and I believe he is honest; but the gentleman can not escape from the logical conclusion of his discourse, namely, that the Philippines should forever be retained under the control of the United States on the ground that it will pay. For the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in showing that the Philippines are not a bad bargain, put his stress not so much upon what they produce now as upon what they may produce later on. "Think of the vast possibilities," he says, "if these people," and so forth. I ask the gentleman, If the Philippines ought to be kept under American control now because of what they may purchase from and sell to the United States when they shall become more densely populated and developed, will he let them go then when they have actually attained the state that he is predicting?

The gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD], in an article entitled "A suggested Democratic policy," which he wrote for the National Monthly Magazine, has also spoken of these untold possibilities for investment in the Philippine Islands. I do not believe that either of these gentlemen look upon the Philippine problem from the standpoint of dollars and cents. And if it were only a question of arguing with them, I should leave this phase of the question wholly untouched, for I do not understand how in a matter like this, where the rights of 8,000,000 human beings are at stake, the imports and exports of a country could have any bearing or exert any influence upon the decision one way or the other.

There are, however, some people in this country whose hostility to Philippine independence is dictated by the profits they are making or expect to make out of the present relationship between the Philippines and the United States. Who would care to deny that the Philippines have been so far a good bargain for those who have purchased Philippine Government bonds at the guaranteed rate of 4 per cent interest; those who own our railroads and to whom the Philippine Government guarantees 4 per cent profit on every dollar they invest; those who are benefited by the rebate on our hemp exported to the United States; and those who, in spite of the positive injunction of an act of Congress, have been able to acquire, hold, and exploit vast tracts of our sugar lands? Of course, these interests will leave no stone unturned to oppose Philippine independence, but they do not disclose the real motive that underlies their conduct. Theirs is not the voice of conquest, of greed, of territorial aggrandizement. When they appeal to the American people for the retention of the Philippines they always do so in the name of justice and of sympathy for the poor, ignorant Filipinos who are badly in need of American rule. Will the American people listen to this hypocritical cry? Shall the American people longer continue to bear a burden that entails the expense of an increasing Army, the building of fortifications, the enlarging of the Navy, merely to allow men who, not content with exploiting their own brothers at home, wish to control the lands and opportunities of another country which have been given by the will of God to the inhabitants thereof for their own use? This is but another phase of the great battle which is being waged by the American people against predatory wealth. It is the old conflict between the rights of man and the insatiable greed of gain.

THE PHILIPPINES A WHITE ELEPHANT.

Mr. Chairman, I have no quarrel with any man who chooses to oppose Philippine independence because he thinks that it is to his own interest, or to the interest of his own country, to keep the islands in subjection. It is but human that when our own interests are at stake that we should look after them. It is our duty—the duty of every man—to care for the interests of his own country. But, I assert, Mr. Chairman, that the possession of the Philippines by the United States is in no respect to the interest of the American people; and that when once the present generation of Filipinos is convinced that it may not look forward to its freedom within its lifetime, such control will not be profitable even to the private interests I have indicated.

PROFITLESS EXPENSE OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

The American people must lose by it, because the retention of the islands means more Army, more fortifications, and more Navy, all of which involves increase in national expenditures. How much, may I ask, has the average American gained from the possession of the Philippines? Nothing. Outside of those who are employed in the Philippine service or have capital invested in the Philippines no other American gets any benefit. And how much, after all, do these few privileged Americans gain? Not even a score of millions a year. Yet the Philippines cost the people of the United States 10 years ago, according to the late Senator Hoar, as well informed a man as any who ever sat in the Congress of the United States and who was as good a Republican as the best, not less than $600,000,000. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] said a few days ago in this House, and proved it, that they are now costing the United States $40,000,000 yearly. These figures have not been controverted by our adversaries, save only one item.

FORTHCOMING LOSS TO THE "INTERESTS."

As for the capitalists who have money invested in the islands let them consider what they are doing before they commit this country to a policy of permanent or indefinite retention. They must never forget that trade can not be imposed upon a people by force; that commercial or industrial enterprise is essentially voluntary, and that to succeed financially in the islands they must reckon with one important factor—the good will of the Filipino people.

The Filipinos are now harmoniously working hand in hand not only with the American Government in the Philippines, but with American enterprises in the islands, because they still believe that they will receive justice at the hands of the United States and that it is only a matter of a short time before their independence will be granted. If, to their misfortune, the day should ever come when, owing to the efforts of the few American "interests" in the islands, they shall be deprived of their sacred right to freedom, I doubt very much if these "interests" will be able to secure the cooperation of the people in their business. I should fear that under those conditions the gains which they have promised to themselves will be converted into real losses.

"AUTHORITIES" ON THE PHILIPPINES.

I come now to that portion of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that is apparently most carefully prepared and most elaborate. I refer to his statement on the ignorance and lack of homogeneity of the Filipino people and their unfitness for self-government. Of course everything that the gentleman says on this phase of the subject is taken from other authorities, such as President Taft, ex-President Roosevelt, ex-Secretary of War Dickinson, and the Philippine census. His statements do not rest upon his own knowledge. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that Mr. Taft is "better qualified than any other American to testify concerning" the Filipinos because "his familiarity with the Spanish language enabled him to acquire an unusual amount of information as to their—the Filipinos'—intelligence, their habits of thought, and their desires." No wonder that Mr. Taft has not acquired the information that the gentleman from Pennsylvania attributes to him, for he does not and has never possessed the knowledge of Spanish by which the gentleman from Pennsylvania asserts that he has acquired that information. President Taft has never known the Spanish language, and, in so far as I am aware, he never asserted that he knew it.

Mr. OLMSTED. But I have heard him talk with Spaniards.

Mr. QUEZON. I suppose he has said "buenos dias." He does not speak Spanish, and he never had any direct communication with the Filipinos except with those very few who at that time could speak English.

CURRY AND BLOUNT VERSUS TAFT.

But it is true that Mr. Taft had been for two years governor general in the Philippines. He visited nearly every Province and has met personally many Filipinos. He has undoubtedly more knowledge about the Philippines than the great majority of the American people, but I question the statement that he is "better qualified than any other American" to testify concerning the Filipinos. There are many Americans who have had more intimate contact with the people of the Philippines, who have lived for a longer period of years in the islands, and who speak Spanish and native dialects. Some, at least, of these Americans are utterly at variance with Mr. Taft in his opinion as to the unfitness of the Filipino people for self-government, their ignorance, and lack of homogeneity. I can cite the case of Gov. CURRY, now a Member of this House from New Mexico, who has been in the Philippines for eight years, has traveled throughout the islands, was an officer of Volunteers, governor of one Province in the northern part of Luzon and of another in the south in the group of the Visayan Islands, and chief of police of Manila. Gov. CURRY says that the people of the Philippines are homogeneous; that they constitute a nation and are capable enough to establish and maintain a government, republican in form, that will certainly suit their own needs better than any American government that can be imposed upon them. There likewise is the testimony of Judge Blount, whose book, The American Occupation of the Philippines, has already attracted wide attention, and of many others.

FILIPINOS AGAINST TAFT.

Even admitting that Mr. Taft is better qualified than any other American to testify concerning the Filipinos, would anyone assert that he is better qualified than the Filipinos to testify about themselves? And the Filipinos are united in their assertion that they constitute a homogeneous people, capable of governing themselves, with one common, paramount ambition—to see their country free. It must be remembered that President Taft has been found, by the verdict of every State of the Union save Utah and Vermont, wrong in his domestic policies. Yet Mr. Taft ought to be better qualified to say what is best for the American people. May he not be equally wrong in his Philippine policy?

EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT ON THE PHILIPPINES.

As for ex-President Roosevelt, his knowledge about the Philippines is as little dependable as that of President Taft. Ex-President Roosevelt became an authority on the Philippines, I suppose, because of the fact that since the islands came under American control he was for a time President of the United States and thus had the responsibility of administering their affairs. Mr. Roosevelt was never in the Philippines. While he was President Mr. Taft became the first Governor General of the islands and later Secretary of War. Of course, not knowing the Philippines from personal observation Mr. Roosevelt had to depend altogether upon what Mr. Taft, his own subordinate, told him.

EX-SECRETARY DICKINSON.

As to ex-Secretary of War Dickinson, he was appointed Secretary of War by President Taft at the beginning of the latter's administration. Prior to that time he never was in the Philippines and has made no special study of those people. Upon taking office he at once became responsible for the administration of the affairs of 8,000,000 people without knowing much about them, and as administrator of those people was called upon to carry out the policy that was laid down, not by himself, but by Mr. Taft. The views, ideas, and policies of this administration with regard to the Philippines were, of course, known to ex-Secretary of War Dickinson, as they were known to all of us. The administration believed that the Filipino people were not ready for self-government, and it was natural that ex-Secretary of War Dickinson, not having himself made any personal and deep study of the islands, should take the views of the administration. After having been at the head of the War Department for two years, living in an atmosphere of disbelief in the ability of the Filipinos for self-government, the Secretary of War went to the islands. He visited, it is true, several provinces of the archipelago and met many people in private conferences and at banquets, dances, and public receptions that were tendered to him. He did not speak Spanish or any native dialect. His visit was so short that he could not have formed any real opinion of his own concerning the Philippine situation strong enough to replace that which he had formed in the imperialistic atmosphere of the War Department before he went to the Philippines.

From these observations it will be seen that the opinion of the "authorities" cited by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not to be taken as conclusive or final, much less when it is realized that other Americans equally, if not better, qualified entertain an opposite theory, and that the Filipinos are altogether on this side of the question and by all laws of nature ought to know themselves better and have more regard for their own welfare than do the American imperialists.

THE PHILIPPINE CENSUS.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania in his efforts to establish the ignorance and lack of homogeneity of the people of the Philippines, which exists only in the imagination of those who do not know those people, quoted extracts from the Philippine census that, in the opinion of the gentleman, prove conclusively his contention. The same thing was done by the gentleman from New York. It is well to remember that the census of the Philippines was taken under the guidance of the Philippine Commission, at that time headed by Mr. Taft, and that the opinions of Mr. Taft and his colleagues as to the capacity for self-government of the Filipino are reflected in that work. The director of the census himself—Maj. Gen. Sanger, United States Army, retired—was appointed at the request of Gov. Taft, and was placed at the head of this important work without any previous connection or knowledge of the Filipino people. It is unnecessary to say that Gen. Sanger believed with Mr. Taft and with the majority of his Army comrades that the Filipinos were better fitted to be governed than to govern themselves. But even at that, if the tables of the census are carefully studied, there will be found ample material to support the opposite theory, and much more so if to this we should add the consideration that this census was taken 10 years ago, and that since that time great progress has been made by the Filipinos along educational, commercial, and industrial lines, a fact to which present Government officials take pride in testifying.

An analysis of the quotations made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania from the census, as well as of his comments thereon, shows that his quotations and comments are not altogether reliable. For instance, he quotes that passage in the census which says:

> The selection of a sufficient number of intelligent Filipinos able to read, write, and speak the Spanish language, as well as the various dialects of the people, to serve as enumerators and special agents was by no means a trivial undertaking, for although it was estimated that of the 7,000,000 of civilized population 700,000 approximately could read and write Spanish, according to the Archbishop of Manila, not more than 7,000 belong to the educated class.

THREE PER CENT OF FILIPINOS HAVE SUPERIOR EDUCATION.

On page 80, volume 2 of the same census, we read:

> Out of the total number of males of voting age the number having superior education was 50,140, or 3 per cent.

This is certainly in open contradiction to the statement that only 7,000 Filipinos belonged to the educated class, unless, in the opinion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, those having superior education do not constitute an educated class.

ALMOST 50 PER CENT OF LITERACY.

Again, on pages 78 and 79 of the same volume of the census we find this statement:

> The total number of males 10 years of age and over was 2,473,777. * * * There were 1,161,925 males who were able to read. * * * The number of males who could both read and write was 735,564.

These figures convey an idea entirely different from that which the paragraph quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania would seem to convey.

THE FILIPINOS A HOMOGENEOUS PEOPLE.

The gentleman seems greatly elated at finding certain reports from provincial governors testifying to the lack of homogeneity and knowledge of the Filipinos. These same reports are quoted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD]. The gentleman from Pennsylvania affirmed that the reports in question "are interesting and important in this connection" because they are made by "native Filipinos." It is to be regretted that the gentleman did not take greater pains to verify these assertions before he made them, for he would have found that the governors whose reports he quoted are not Filipinos at all. The governor of Bataan, whose report he quotes, was Capt. John H. Goldman, and the governor of Ambos Camarines, whose report is also quoted, was Capt. James Ross. The census on page 599 of volume 1 gives the names of these governors.

In contrast as well as in answer to the reports of these American governors, I beg to quote now from reports of governors who are in truth "native Filipinos."

Gov. J. Ortega, of La Union, Ilocano Province, says of the people under his jurisdiction:

> The Ilocanos are of medium height, brown color, fair constitution, and they enjoy good health as a rule; have healthy customs, are moral and honest, chastity and love of home predominating among them, and notwithstanding the fact that they are submissive, obedient, and of a timid character, they would commit crime when offended in their honor, and when they do not find any more satisfactory vindication for conjugal infidelity, then the death of the offender and the faithless one at the hand of the offended.

Gov. Gracio Gonzaga, of Cagayan, Cagayan Province, says:

> The customs of the inhabitants of this Province are temperate, they are obedient to the authorities, and their character is pacific, hospitable, and moderate and frugal in food and drink.

Gov. Simeon Luz, of Batangas, Tagalog Province, speaks thus of his people:

> The manners and customs of the natives of this Province differ very little, if at all, from those of the other inhabitants of the archipelago, this being the case more especially with regard to the Tagalog Province of Luzon. As a rule, the Filipino of Batangas is very hospitable, moderate, sober, religious, and very much attached to the soil of his birth, characteristics which distinguish the race in general.

Likewise Gov. Martin Delgado, of Iloilo, Visayan Province, says:

> The customs and manner of living of the inhabitants of this Province are, generally speaking, identical with or very similar to those in the other Provinces of the archipelago; they are moderate, temperate, simple, and hospitable in every respect. They are very much attached to their homes and families, which they do not leave except when forced to do so by reason of being obliged to seek their support in other sections.

And Gov. Juan Climaco, of Cebu, Visayan Province, says:

> There are scarcely any peculiarities which distinguish in a marked degree the Cebuanos from the other inhabitants of the islands. The culture, religion, disposition, manners, and customs of all are similar. There is to be noted, however, a greater industrial activity among them than among those of the neighboring Provinces, especially in all that relates to agriculture, due, perhaps, to the necessity of stimulating production. The soil of Cebu is not naturally extremely fertile, and manual labor is necessary in order to make it supply man's necessities.

These reports are the best answer to the sometimes ignorant, sometimes malicious, statement that the Filipinos do not constitute a homogeneous people, but are instead a "conglomeration of different tribes, with different characteristics." Those different "tribes," it is said, are the Ilocanos and Cagayanes, inhabiting the northern part of the island of Luzon; the Tagalogs, who inhabit the center and south of that island; and the Visayans, who inhabit the southern group of the archipelago. The reports I have quoted come from an Ilocano, Cagayan, Tagalog, and Visayan governor. The Provinces over which they have authority are situated—La Union and Cagayan in the most northern part of Luzon, Batangas in the border of the center and south of Luzon, Iloilo and Cebu in the southern islands of Panay and Cebu. All these governors attribute to the people of their respective Provinces the same characteristics, namely, hospitality, sobriety, piety, morality, and love for order, home, and family. They are unanimous in stating that the culture, manners, customs, and habits of thought of the people of their respective Provinces are identical with those of the rest of the archipelago.

The different denominations given to the inhabitants of certain regions of the islands—Ilocanos, Cagayanes, and so forth—are, to those not intimately acquainted with the Filipinos, most misleading. The impression naturally conveyed by these different names is that the people thus differently named are heterogeneous. The Filipinos do not among themselves apply the names Tagal, Ilocano, or Visayan, but use the word "Filipino." In their gatherings nobody knows, or cares to know, from what region of the archipelago this or that man may come. There is no more difference, except that of local dialect, between the Ilocano of the northernmost and the Visayan of the southernmost Provinces than there is between a Californian and Oregonian. In fact, there does not exist, nor has there ever existed, an antagonism between the inhabitants of different Provinces, since, fortunately, there has never been a bloody contest like the War of Secession, nor any sectional warfare amongst us.

No intelligent man who knows the contemporaneous history of the Philippine Islands and has had an intimate contact with the people of the Philippines can honestly say that the Filipinos do not constitute a homogeneous people, conscious of their own nationality. Racially the Filipinos are more homogeneous than the people of the United States, because while the American people to-day include elements coming from different parts and races of Europe, the Filipinos all belong to the same stock—the Malay race. In religion they are also more homogeneous than the people of the United States, for practically all the civilized people of the Philippines, numbering more than seven and a half millions out of the total population of eight millions, are Roman Catholics. Belonging to the same race, molded by the same church and the same civilization for the past 300 years, the Filipinos would naturally have, as they have in fact, the same characteristics, customs, habits, and ideas.

THE FILIPINOS CONSTITUTE A NATION.

That they constitute a nation, that they have common national aspirations and feelings, is a fact proven beyond any question. The pages of the contemporary history of the Philippines are illuminated with the most eloquent proofs of the unity of the Filipino people. In the struggle for freedom the sons of the northern as well as those of the southern islands have given their lives.

There is not a region in the whole Philippine Archipelago which has not been sprinkled with the blood of the inhabitants of that territory in the common struggle of the country for liberty. At the call of the Philippine independence cause, every Province in the archipelago, those Provinces said to be inhabited by people of different tribes, responded, and headed by one man, whose local origin no one cared to inquire, they revolted against Spain and conquered every garrison and imprisoned every Spanish soldier outside the city of Manila. In defense of that same independence which they had so bravely wrung from their former masters and under the direction of a government which they themselves had established they opposed American domination in the islands, in spite of the fact that they knew but too well that their opposition would be crushed and that their reward for love of country would be death. The following extract from a declaration made by Admiral Dewey before the Senate Committee on the Philippines indicates how united were the Filipinos in their revolution against Spain. When the admiral was asked how large was the Philippine army which revolted against Spain he said it numbered about 25,000, and added:

They could have had any number of men; it was just a question of arming them. They could have had the whole population.

Gen. MacArthur, the man who successfully defeated the Philippine Army, in a report in 1900 to the War Department, explaining how with few and a poor quality of arms the Filipinos were capable of offering a long resistance to the United States Army, which at that time in the Philippines amounted to 120,000 men, said in so many words that from the inception of hostilities it was decided by a council of war that owing to the great difference between the American Army and the Filipino army a guerrilla warfare would be best adapted to the peculiar conditions of the struggle; but in order to give the world a practical demonstration of their capacity for organization and self-government it was thought necessary that at first the war should be conducted in a regular manner, with a concentrated field army. After this plan had been carried out, about November 12, 1898, the form of guerrilla warfare was adopted. Describing this guerrilla warfare, Gen. MacArthur textually says:

The success of this unique system of warfare depended upon almost complete unity of action of the entire native population. That such unity is a fact is too obvious to admit of discussion. Intimidation has undoubtedly accomplished much to this end, but fear, as the only motive, is hardly sufficient to account for the unity and apparently spontaneous action of several millions of people. One traitor in each town would effectually destroy such a complex organization. It is more probable that the adhesive principle comes from ethnological homogeneity, which induces men to respond for a time to the appeals of consanguine leadership.

The same officer made the following statement before the Senate committee:

When I first started in against these rebels I believed that Aguinaldo's troops represented only one faction. I did not believe that the whole population was opposed to us; but I have been reluctantly compelled to believe that the Filipinos are loyal to Aguinaldo and the government which he represents.

The testimony of the two men most competent to judge how the Filipinos fought against Spain and later against the United States shows conclusively that they were united in both those struggles. Was it possible, if there did not exist a common sense of nationality, a common national ambition, that these people, said to be so heterogeneous, would unite to make the greatest sacrifices that any people can make—those of their lives and of their property?

While the people of the Philippines have shown in time of war that they are one, they have given a like proof in time of peace. There are at present two political parties in the Philippine Islands. They are not based upon sectional policies. Both of these parties extend throughout the archipelago and hold local as well as national conventions. Both these parties advocate Philippine independence, the difference being only with reference to the method of obtaining it. There is a Philippine Board of Commerce, wherein the commercial interests of every part of the country are represented. There is a Philippine farmers' organization, which holds occasional national conventions, attended by representative farmers from all parts of the archipelago. The lower house of the Philippine Legislature, namely, the Philippine Assembly, is composed of Filipinos from every civilized Province of the Archipelago. There are represented the so-called Ilocanos, Cagayanes, Pampangos, Tagalogs, and Visayans, by districts and according to population, and they select their speaker and other officers of the house, regardless of the region from which they come. The Hon. Sergip Osmeña, speaker of the assembly, is a Visayan, and he being a nationalist received the unanimous support of the members of the nationalist party in the house, regardless of whether the member was a Tagal, Ilocano, or Cagayan. Members who were Visayans, coming from the speaker's region, but belonging to the progresista party, voted for the Hon. Vicente Singson, an Ilocano, who is the leader of the minority. The Resident Commissioners in the United States are elected by the Philippine Legislature, and he who has the honor to address you, being himself a Tagal, received not only every vote of the Tagal assemblymen, but also of every Visayan, Ilocano, and Cagayan—in fact, of every member of the two political parties of the assembly, because I advocate Philippine independence and both parties are united in favor of my contention.

Speaking of the Philippine Assembly, Mr. James Alexander Robertson, librarian of the Philippine Library, who is by no means a partisan of immediate independence for the Philippines, says:

Conversations with various of the delegates show them to be on the whole men of relative superior intelligence, alert, and anxious for the best good of the Philippines. This last is a very significant fact. The delegates, although elected to represent a certain locality, are keenly alive to the fact that they represent all the Philippines and must obtain the best good for the whole country.

DR. JOSÉ RIZAL, NATIONAL HERO.

The recognition of a national hero in any country is evidence of the national consciousness of the people thereof. The Filipinos have their national hero—Dr. José Rizal, who was shot to death by order of the Spanish Government on the 30th of December, 1896. The crime of Dr. Rizal was the crime of George Washington—he loved his people and sought their freedom. He paid for his patriotism with his life, and he died gladly. On the eve of his martyrdom he wrote one of the noblest poems that ever came from a patriot pen. In every town in the Philippine Archipelago the 30th of December is consecrated to the memory of Dr. Rizal; he is venerated by every Filipino, and his picture hangs prominently in every home, from the costliest to the humblest. Each and every man in every one of the so-called tribes of the Philippines regards Dr. Rizal as Americans regard George Washington.

CONGRESSMAN COOPER ON RIZAL.

Rizal is known to the civilized world. He is in the list of immortals. The Hon. HENRY A. COOPER devoted to his memory a large part of his speech in the House of Representatives on June 19, 1902. I quote from that speech:

It has been said that if American institutions had done nothing else than furnish to the world the character of George Washington, "that alone would entitle them to the respect of mankind." So, sir, I say to all those who denounce the Filipinos indiscriminately as barbarians and savages, without possibility of a civilized future, that this despised race proved itself entitled to their respect and to the respect of mankind when it furnished to the world the character of José Rizal.

* * * * * * *

On the night before his death he wrote a poem. I will read it that the House may know what were the last thoughts of this "pirate," this "barbarian," this "savage" of a race incapable of civilization:

MY LAST THOUGHT.

[Translation.]

Land I adore, farewell; thou land of the southern sun's choosing,
Pearl of the Orient seas, our forfeited Garden of Eden,
Joyous, I yield up for thee my sad life, and were it far brighter,
Young, rose strewn, for thee and thy happiness still would I give it.
Far afield, in the din and rush of maddening battle,
Others have laid down their lives, nor wavered, nor paused, in the giving.
What matters way or place; the cypress, the lily, the laurel,
Gibbet, or open field, the sword or inglorious torture;
When 'tis the hearth and the country that call for the life's immolation?
Dawn's faint light bars the east, she smiles through the cowl of the darkness,
Just as I die.

* * * * * * *

Vision I followed from afar, desire that spurred on and consumed me,
Greeting! my parting soul cries, and greeting again, O my country!
Beautiful is it to fall, that the vision may rise to fulfillment.
Giving my life for thy life, and breathing thine air in the death throe;
Sweet to eternally sleep in thy lap, O land of enchantment!
If in the deep rich grass that covers my rest in thy bosom,
Some day thou seest upspring a lowly, tremulous blossom,
Lay there thy lips, 'tis my soul.

* * * * * * *

And if at eventide a soul for my tranquil sleep prayeth,
Pray thou, too, O my fatherland, for my peaceful reposing.
Pray for those who go down to death through unspeakable torments;
Pray for those who remain to suffer torture in prison;
Pray for the bitter grief of our mothers, our widows, our orphans;
Oh, pray, too, for thyself, on the way to thy final redemption.

When our still dwelling place wraps night's dusky mantle about her,
Leaving the dead alone with the dead, to watch till the morning,
Break not our rest, and seek not to lay death's mystery open.
If now and then thou shouldst hear the string of a lute or a zither,
Mine is the hand, dear country, and mine is the voice that is singing.

When my tomb, that all have forgot, no cross nor stone marketh,
There let the laborer guide his plow, there cleave the earth open.
So shall my ashes at last be one with thy hills and thy valleys.
Little 'twill matter, then, my country, that thou shouldst forget me.
I shall be air in thy streets, and I shall be space in thy meadows;
I shall be vibrant speech in thine ears, shall be fragrance and color,
Light and shout, and loved song, forever repeating my message.

Idolized fatherland, thou crown and deep of my sorrows,
Lovely Philippine Isles, once again adieu, I am leaving
All with thee, my friends, my love. Where I go are no tyrants.
There one dies not for the cause of his faith, there God is the ruler.

Farewell, father and mother and brothers, dear friends of the fireside,
Thankful ye should be for me that I rest at the end of the long day.
Farewell, sweet, from the stranger's land, my joy and my comrade.
Farewell, dear ones, farewell. To die is to rest from our labors.

PIRATES! BARBARIANS! SAVAGES! INCAPABLE OF CIVILIZATION!

How many of the civilized Caucasian slanderers of his race could ever be capable of thoughts like these, which on that awful night, as he sat alone amidst silence unbroken save by the rustling of the black plumes of the death angel at his side, poured from the soul of the martyred Filipino? Search the long and bloody roll of the world's martyred dead and where, on what soil, under what sky, did tyranny ever claim a nobler victim?

Sir, the future is not without hope for a people which, from the midst of such environment, has furnished to the world a character so lofty and so pure as that of José Rizal. * * *

LACK OF UNIVERSAL LANGUAGE NOT AN OBSTACLE TO INDEPENDENCE.

The gentlemen from Pennsylvania and New York, and, like them, every enemy of Philippine independence, assert that because there are many different dialects spoken in the Archipelago, and there is no language known to and spoken by every Filipino, hence the Filipinos, not understanding one another, can have no national feeling or thought.

Nobody cares to deny that there are different native dialects spoken in the Philippines and that there is no one language which is understood and used by every Filipino—man, woman, and child. But the facts which I have already stated show conclusively that the lack of a universal language in the Philippines has not prevented the Filipinos from being a homogeneous and united people. Indeed, the opponents of Philippine independence, in their efforts to postpone the recognition of that innate right of ours to become the sole masters of our destiny, demand that there should exist in the Philippines conditions that do not exist anywhere else in the world. In the United States itself how many thousands of people are there constituting a part of this body politic who have no understanding of English? There are many well-governed democracies as well as kingdoms in Europe where the people speak different languages. The model of all republics and democracies, that small country of Switzerland, has three official languages—Italian, French, and German—because the people inhabiting the cantons bordering Italy speak Italian, those bordering Germany speak German, and those bordering France speak French. In the Austrian Empire also different languages are spoken. In England the polished style of the English gentleman is scarcely understood, and is not spoken by the masses of the people, nor is the Cockney English understood by the elegant Englishman. And a like condition prevails in many other independent countries of Europe and Asia.

INTERCOMMUNICATION IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The fact is that it is not a prerequisite of freedom or nationalism that a people shall speak the same language. It is enough that there be some language—maybe one or several—imposed and accepted as the official language, and by means of which political, governmental, commercial, and industrial intercommunication could be had between the different parts of the country.

Spanish has long been the official language in the islands, and through it not only administrative affairs, but also business affairs, have been successfully conducted throughout the Archipelago. The manner by which knowledge of public questions and policies is conveyed to every inhabitant, regardless of his knowledge of the Spanish language, is simple. Besides Spanish newspapers in Manila and in the Provinces there are also native journals. These native papers inform the reader, who does not speak Spanish, of every current topic in his own native dialect. Thus the lack of a common language does not serve as an obstacle for the diffusion of knowledge of public matters. Another way by which every question of public interest is discussed by the masses of the people is that of popular meetings, which take place in every town and village of the archipelago, just as is the case in the United States. In those meetings the speakers use the vernacular of the locality, and the people are thus informed of subjects of general concern.

AMERICAN ADMINISTRATORS, NOT KNOWING SPANISH, GOVERNED THE ISLANDS THROUGH THAT LANGUAGE AS OFFICIAL.

Certainly the lack of a universal language has never been in the Philippines an obstacle to the carrying on of government nor for the pursuit of any business enterprise. Spain has been governing the islands for three centuries through this language, and the United States has done the same for 13 years despite the remarkable circumstance that the governing class did not speak the official language which they had to use in governing the people. Since it has been possible for American administrators to govern the Philippines, using Spanish as the official language, although that language was not universally spoken by the Filipinos and was altogether unknown by most of those administrators, it would certainly be easier for the Filipinos to govern the Philippines using Spanish as an official language. But the conditions during the next eight years will improve still more in the use and knowledge of this official language in the Philippines. By the date contemplated in the Jones bill for the granting of Philippine independence the official language of the islands will have come to be English, and it will then be spoken by the majority of Filipinos.

More than 700,000 children have already been given the knowledge of English through the public schools. These are now, or are about to be, of voting age. Within eight years a million or more will have passed out of the schools. The enrollment for the last 10 years in public schools has never been less than 500,000, but besides these schools there have been private as well as parochial schools, colleges, and universities, where hundreds of thousands of children are given education and also taught English. The enrollment for 1911 in the public schools was over 600,000. Of 8,360 teachers in the public schools, 7,696 are Filipinos.

Coupled with the knowledge of English, literacy in the Philippines has grown immensely since the taking of the census. Ten years ago those who could neither read nor write were 2,762,093 of the total population of 4,973,526 of 10 years of age and over, or 55.5 per cent. To-day the illiteracy can not be more than 40 per cent, and within eight years, without any question, it will be less than 30.

My prediction is by no means due to a groundless optimism, but to the fact that the Filipinos are doing everything to educate themselves. This is a statement which the most extreme imperialist dares not deny. Not only the children, but their parents also, are learning. Col. J. G. Harbord, of the Philippine Constabulary, who has been in the islands for many years and who is still there, has said:

> No sojourner in the Philippines can fail to notice the intense desire of all classes of the people for education. It is the wish of which he will be most constantly reminded. Servants, coachmen, laborers, hundreds of them carry little phrase books of short language methods and are earnestly striving to learn English. * * * Public money for education is one appropriation never criticized by the vernacular press of Manila. Night and day schools are well attended, and in some of the former local officials, overcoming their fear of ridicule and swallowing their pride, have sat beside their own children as pupils learning English. Certainly the desire for education is one of the moving motives of Filipino life to-day. Parents make the most complete sacrifices to send their children to school, and the pupils themselves endure hunger and privations to secure learning.

NUMBER OF FILIPINO VOTERS.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania alleged that there are very few qualified electors in the Philippines, and in support of his contention he said that of 8,000,000 people but 98,257 voted at the election of the first Philippine Assembly, which took place in 1907; that at the election of 1908 but 192,975 voted; and at the election of 1912, 248,154 registered and 235,786 voted. From these figures the gentleman concluded that only a very small percentage of the total population of the islands has the lawful qualification to take part in public affairs and that therefore the inhabitants are not able to establish and maintain a republican form of government as that is understood by the people of the United States.

Comparing the figures given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania of the registered votes at the last election, 248,154, with the total voting population, 1,500,000, the electors in the Philippines are 15 per cent of the voting population. The gentleman says that this is too small a percentage for the people thus qualified to be able to establish a republican form of government, as this kind of government is understood by the people of the United States, and therefore the Filipinos should not be given independence.

A WRONG THEORY.

The proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to be, and, in fact, he said so in the course of his remarks, that the Filipino people should not be granted independence until they are capable of establishing a republican form of government as the idea is conceived and understood by the people of the United States. If the gentleman is right, we may just as well renounce once and for all the hope of ever becoming an independent nation. First, because it will be an insoluble problem for the Filipino people to find out at this juncture just what the American people's idea is of a republican government. We have heard in the last national campaign from the leaders of the different political parties in this country so many different expressions of what they consider to be true democracy and popular government that we are almost lost in the conflict of these opposite theories. Certainly the gentleman from Pennsylvania, being a "standpatter," can not claim to have with him the American people, and he can hardly expect to impose upon the Filipinos as prerequisite to their independence the requirement that they partake of his views on the subject. Second, because if there was unanimity among the Americans as to how they shall be governed it will require the Filipinos to adopt it, that they shall be an alter ego of the American people. Of course it is out of the question to expect that such a condition will ever come.

The gentleman's theory is wrong, and he must know that it is untenable. More than this, if carried to its ultimate consequences it is anarchical. The theory, in effect, means, when expressed in general terms, that the United States has a right to withhold independence from countries incapable of establishing a republican form of government according to American ideas. How long has this been a political tenet in this country? I have always thought that the United States has proclaimed to the world the fundamental principle that every people has the right to establish such government as they choose. Let us carry into effect the theory of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the United States should have to deprive England, Germany, Russia, Italy, and every kingdom of Europe of their independence; it should not have recognized the independence of Cuba, and never should have retired from Mexico.

AMERICAN OLIGARCHY.

There is another point which shows the inconsistency of the position of those who would keep the Philippines under the United States, because only 15 per cent of them have the right to share in the conduct of the government. The proposition is that it is not Americanism to permit that so small percentage of the population shall have in their hands the sole guidance of the ship of state. If it is not Americanism to permit 15 per cent of the Filipinos to govern their countrymen what is it to permit five Americans to govern the whole population? For this is in fact the government of the Philippines to-day, an oligarchical government, monopolized by the American commissioners appointed by the President of the United States acting without even consulting the will of any Filipino.

But in considering the number of voters in the Philippines at present it should be borne in mind that the electoral laws in the islands, enacted by the commission, require certain qualifications that should not be required anywhere and would not be required by the Filipino people if they had their own government. Fifteen per cent only can vote in the Philippines, because many good and well-qualified citizens have been deprived of this right by laws enacted by American officials. The Filipinos who should be permitted to vote, and will be permitted to vote by an independent Philippine Government, because they are intelligent, law-abiding men, constitute a majority of the voting population.

QUALIFICATIONS TO VOTE.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania cited in the following language the qualifications required by law to be an elector in the Philippines: "Anybody may vote who was an officeholder under the Spanish régime, or who is able to speak or write either English or Spanish, or who possesses property to the value of $250 gold, or who pays taxes to the amount of $15 per annum." The gentleman considers these requirements very "simple." I beg to take issue with the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his proposition that these requirements are "simple," if by this he means that in civilized countries the majority of the people, at least, should have these qualifications. Were they to be applied in the United States there would be an enormous reduction in the electorate.

ENGLISH OR SPANISH QUALIFICATION TO VOTE.

I have asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania how many voters there would be in this country if the people of the United States were required to read and write German or any other foreign language. And I ask the same question again. Neither Spanish nor English are native languages in the Philippines. There are millions of Filipinos who read and write their native dialects, but who do not read or write either Spanish or English, and they are unwisely, nay, unjustly, deprived of the franchise.

To demand the capacity to read and write English or Spanish as a prerequisite to the use of the ballot is wholly unreasonable. A Filipino may be a very intelligent man, wholly able to vote on public questions affecting his town, his Province, or the entire archipelago, without knowing one word of either Spanish or English, if he reads and writes his own native dialect, for the native dialects of the Philippines have their own literature. Public questions are discussed in native writings and there are many important texts translated into these native languages as well as others written originally in native tongues by native Filipinos. A Filipino, Baltazar, wrote a poem in Tagalo which can be compared with any of Shakespeare's dramas, yet he never had any acquaintance with a foreign language. If the people of the Philippines who know how to read and write their own native dialects were to be allowed to vote, the number of voters would be increased manyfold.

PROPERTY QUALIFICATION.

Two hundred and fifty dollars is a great deal of property in the Philippine Islands. It is more than a family needs for the purchase of a home and farm. Two and a half acres of land devoted to any kind of crop can easily support a large family in the Philippines. The average price of land per acre is not more than $50, and in some localities it does not reach $15 per acre. How greatly would the number of voters in the United States be reduced if in order to vote they had to own $250 worth of property! It must, moreover, be borne in mind that $250 of property in the Philippines is equivalent, at least, to $1,000 in the United States. There are, I think, in the Philippines, comparatively speaking, more landowners than in any other country in the world, and this is one of the very best reasons for expecting stability of government there. The man who owns a home and farm is generally interested in good and stable government, because he is interested in having his home and his farm protected. There are, however, in the Philippines but few very large landowners among the native population of the islands; and this is another desirable factor in the situation, that while there are many small farmers there are no large capitalists who might become exploiters.

NUMBER OF FARMS.

The Philippine census gives as the total number of farms in the island 815,453, the average size of a farm being 7½ acres. Think of it! In a country of 8,000,000 people there are 815,453 farms, which means that an equal number of families own land and are engaged in farming.

American statesmen claim, and with justice, that the strength and solidity of this Government rests upon the American farmer. What, then, shall we say of the Philippines, where there are, comparatively speaking, many more farmers than in the United States? And yet the farmers, the majority of them, who are the backbone of that Government, who support it with their taxes, are denied the right to vote simply because their farms are not worth $250, although there may be enough means at hand to support them and educate their children.

FIFTEEN DOLLARS REQUIREMENT.

Fifteen dollars direct taxes per annum! That is certainly a large sum for the average citizen to pay in any country. I ask again how many people in the United States would be deprived of the right to vote if they had to pay annually $15 in direct taxes?

There is another provision in the electoral law which the gentleman from Pennsylvania failed to cite, and which is of some consequence in enlarging or diminishing the number of voters in the islands or anywhere else. This is the provision that although a man might speak and write English or Spanish, own property valued at more than $250, and also pay $15 taxes per annum, if he happens to owe any amount, no matter how little, to the treasury for his taxes, he is deprived of the right to vote until he has paid every cent of it.

SOME FILIPINO ELECTORS DO NOT VOTE.

Thus that my first answer to the figures given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to the small number of voters in the Philippine Islands is that the requirements of the law in the Philippines, though they may be "simple," as the gentleman says, are far too rigorous. Were these same requirements imposed by law in any other country, there would be fewer voters, proportionately, than there are in the Philippines. Further, the actual number of people who have been going to the polls so far does not really constitute the only voting population of the islands. There are still many who do not vote for causes other than a lack of the qualifications required by the present laws. The figures given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, even at first sight, illustrate my contention. Nothing has taken place between the years 1907 and 1912 which would indicate a great change in the condition of the people in the Philippines; yet, while in 1907 only 98,257 people voted, in 1912 248,154 registered and 235,786 actually voted—almost 300 per cent increase in less than four years.

Some of the reasons why Philippine voters do not care to exercise their right to vote may be traced to, and found, in the nature of the government we now have. Everybody in the islands realizes that while the people are given the right to select their officers for municipal and provincial governments and the lower house of the legislature, the powers granted to those officers are not only limited in character, but are also subject to the supreme will of the Governor General or of the Philippine Commission, and that the policies of native officials can be carried out only so long as they meet with the pleasure of the American administrators in the islands. Thus many think that it is not worth their while to spend their time in going to the polls to select officers who can not, after all, be real representatives of the people, except to the extent that they are permitted to be so by their masters, the American officials.

There are, in fact, many who do not vote for this reason. I could give the names of some whom I personally know. The increase in the number of voters at the last election was due to the fact that the people of the Philippines are more hopeful of success in their struggle for independence.

And finally, by virtue of acts of Congress, over 500,000 people are deprived of the right to vote in the Philippines, and therefore this number ought to be deducted from the total population of the islands when comparison is drawn between the voters and the population. Those who are thus deprived of the right to vote are the non-Christian Filipinos.

MONOPOLY OF BUSINESS BY FOREIGNERS.

In the effort of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to convict the Filipinos of being an incapable people he made the following remarks:

> The incapacity of the Filipinos for prominent participation even in important private affairs is apparent from the fact that nearly all the commercial houses there are in the hands of Spaniards, Englishmen, Germans, or Americans, and much of the smaller business is in the hands of the Chinese. If they are incapable of managing important private affairs it is not difficult to reason that they are not qualified to participate desirably in the important affairs of government.

It is not true that the Filipinos are not managing important business enterprises in the Philippines. There are important industries, commercial enterprises, and banking houses with large capital entirely owned and managed by Filipinos. These are a few instances: The "Germinal," one of the largest tobacco factories in the islands; the "Hogar Filipino," a company doing banking operations; the "Compañia Maritima," the largest insular steamship company; and the "Cervezeria de S. Miguel," the largest brewery in the islands, are all organized on a basis of Filipino capital and managed by Filipinos, although the majority of the customers of the brewery are foreigners. There are many other important houses in the islands engaged in different kinds of business which are controlled by native capital and subject to native management.

But it is true that the Filipinos do not control the business of the archipelago as they should and as they are entitled to. This is not because of their lack of capability to manage business affairs, but because, having always been under foreign rule, they have never had a fair chance. That, indeed, is one of the reasons why the Filipinos wish to govern their own country; because, as is the case in every colony, the citizens of the governing nation first and after them other foreigners are given by the Government every aid and opportunity for developing and exploiting the territory. Of course, the laws of the Philippines do not discriminate as between a Filipino and an American or any other foreigner in the islands; but the executive officials, whenever they can, without disregarding the letter of the law, help the American business man do so, and whenever they can refuse their help to a Filipino business man they also do so.

In the early days of American occupation of the islands many of the Filipino business men were rather inclined to support American sovereignty; but their experiences in their business undertakings have convinced them that sooner or later, if foreign rule should continue to control the affairs of their country, their business will go into foreign hands.

The Filipinos do not wish to deprive foreign capital of opportunities for investment in the Philippines. On the contrary, they invite foreign capitalists to come to the islands and help to develop the natural resources. But they rightly claim that there should be an equal opportunity for all; that the law should be administered so as to give no preferences to natives or foreigners. If we ever obtain our independence, we pledge ourselves to the faithful carrying out of the policy of equal opportunities for all, without discrimination between races or countries.

THE DE FACTO PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania referred to the short-lived Philippine independent republic; and, quoting the opinion of one or two Army officers, who naturally were not very sympathetic with a government which they fought, said in conclusion that—

> It does not seem to have been very much of a republic.

The fact is that there can not be found another instance in the history of the world where the people, subdued by a foreign nation and starting a revolt against that nation with but very few arms and little ammunition, succeeded in a few months in throwing off the yoke of their foreign master, and from the ashes of that revolution, and facing an imminent war with another nation, built up a government with a liberal and democratic constitution which did not only keep order and enforce law but proceeded at once to establish schools and make public improvements. This is exactly what took place in the Philippines.

Admiral Dewey, having witnessed the working of that Philippine independent government, cabled to the Navy Department on June 23, 1899, that the Filipinos were more capable of self-government than the Cubans are, and later on, in another message, reiterated this same opinion. He said:

> In a telegram sent to the department on June 23, I expressed the opinion that "this people are far superior in their intelligence and more capable of self-government than the natives of Cuba, and I am familiar with both races." Further intercourse with them has confirmed me in this opinion.

Admiral Dewey sent two naval men, Leonard Sargent and W. B. Wilcox, throughout the archipelago to investigate the conditions as they stood in the Philippines at that time, and the report of these men was referred by the admiral to the Navy Department with the following indorsement:

> Approved and respectfully forwarded for the information of the Navy Department. Especial attention is invited to this interesting and carefully prepared report, which, in my opinion, contains the most complete information obtainable in regard to the present state of northern part of Luzon Island.
> Among other things, Mr. Sargent says in that report:
> "It has been my privilege to have been intimately associated with the Filipino people for a short time at a most interesting period of their history. With the permission of Admiral Dewey I spent the greater part of the months of October and November of 1898, in company with Paymaster W. B. Wilcox, United States Navy, in the interior of the northern part of the island of Luzon. It will be remembered that at the date the United States had not yet announced its policy in regard to the Philippines. The terms of the treaty with Spain were being negotiated by our commissioners at Paris, and the fate of the islands hung in the balance. In the meantime, the native population, taking matters into their own hands, had declared their independence from all foreign jurisdiction, and had set up a provisional government, with Aguinaldo at its head. * * * Although this government has never been recognized, and in all probability will go out of existence without recognition, yet it can not be denied that in a region occupied by many millions of inhabitants for nearly six months it stood alone between anarchy and order. The military forces of the United States held control only in Manila, with its environs, and in Cavite, and had no authority to proceed further; while in the vast remaining districts the representatives of the only other recognized power on the field were prisoners in the hands of their despised subjects. It was the opinion at Manila during this anomalous period in our Philippine relations, and possibly in the United States as well, that the state of affairs must breed something akin to anarchy. * * * I can state unreservedly, however, that Mr. Wilcox and I found the existing conditions to be much at variance with this opinion. During our absence from Manila we traveled more than 600 miles in a very comprehensive circuit through the northern part of the island of Luzon, traversing a characteristic and important district. In this way we visited seven provinces, of which some were under immediate control of the central government at Malolos, while others were remotely situated, separated from each other and from the seat of government by natural divisions of land, and accessible only by lengthy and arduous travel. As a tribute to the efficiency of Aguinaldo's government and to the law-abiding character of his subjects, I offer the fact that Mr. Wilcox and I pursued our journey throughout in perfect security, and returned to Manila with only the most pleasing recollections of the quiet and orderly life which we found the natives to be leading under the new régime."

Hon. John Barrett, now director general of the Pan American Union, formerly United States minister to Siam, who saw this government at work, wrote of Aguinaldo, the president of that government, under date of January 16, 1899:

> He has organized a government which has been administering the affairs of that great island (Luzon) since the American occupation in Manila. * * * He has a properly formed cabinet and congress, the members of which, in appearance and manners, would compare favorably with Japanese statesmen. He has amongst his advisers men of acknowledged ability as international lawyers, while his supporters include most of the prominent educated and wealthy natives.

Of our congress Mr. Barrett wrote:

These men, whose sessions I repeatedly attended, conducted themselves with great decorum and showed a knowledge of debate and parliamentary law that would not compare unfavorably with the Japanese Parliament. The executive portion of the government was made up of a ministry of bright men who seemed to understand their respective positions.

THE NONCIVILIZED FILIPINOS.

Let me say a word about these non-Christian inhabitants of the archipelago. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] in his delightful way refers to the Igorrotes, the inhabitants of the hills of the northern part of Luzon, and described their manners and customs to the House. He says: "They were guiltless of all clothing." And he adds, "There is a village there; and I will tell you in a moment about the village, because what I shall tell you will show how fit for self-government some portions of these people are whose claims for independence are pressed upon us."

I find it difficult to conceive how the gentleman from New York can take the position that because there are 100,000 Igorrotes in the Philippine Islands, even if they may be "guiltless of all clothing," seven millions and a half of clothed Filipinos should be deprived of their right to self-government. What would the gentleman from New York think were he told that there are many thousands of Indians in the United States who have no notion of freedom and self-government and that therefore the American people should be deprived of their power of self-government?

COMPARISON BETWEEN UNCIVILIZED PEOPLE IN THE PHILIPPINES TO-DAY AND IN THE UNITED STATES IN 1776.

The existence of a half million uncivilized people in the archipelago, including the Igorrotes, other hill tribes, and Moros, has been time and again alluded to by the opponents of Philippine independence as a reason why the islands should not be free from the control of the United States. How soon these men forget the history of their own country! When the United States acquired its independence from England the proportion of uncivilized inhabitants and of others who, although not altogether uncivilized, were denied the right to share in the government of the Colonies was vastly larger than it is in the Philippines to-day. The inhabitants of the 13 Colonies in 1776 numbered not more than 3,000,000 whites, and while the figures given as to the Indians vary, no one believes there were less than 400,000 at that time. If we also include the negro population then enslaved, what is the proportion between the civilized Americans who fought for their independence and the uncivilized Indians and negro slaves?

In the Philippines, on the other hand, the civilized Filipinos number over 7,400,000, and the uncivilized, according to the census, number only 500,000. Would any American care to affirm that the Colonies ought not to have been given independence because there were many uncivilized people in this country? If Americans have shown that they were entitled to their independence, regardless of the presence of Indians and of the negro slave, and if, after they acquired their independence, they have claimed and exercised the right to govern their wards, upon what logic can the Filipinos be deprived of their independence because of the existence of the Igorrotes and Moros, who must, no doubt, be governed as wards by the civilized Filipinos?

But we are told, and it is urged by both the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New York, that some of these non-Christian inhabitants of the islands will not submit to a Philippine government. They refer to alleged statements made by some Moro chief before ex-Secretary of War Dickinson to the effect that the Moros prefer American control. The alleged preference of the Moros for American rule has been shown to be without basis. After these statements had been made before ex-Secretary of War Dickinson many American officers and soldiers were killed by the Moros despite their love for American rule. I deny that the non-Christian Filipinos refuse to submit to a Philippine government, and I deny it the more positively because during the short-lived Philippine Government all of them recognized the authority of that Government. But suppose that these non-Christian Filipinos should, with arms, oppose the authority of a Philippine independent government, is that any reason why we should not be given our independence? How many years have the Indians resisted the authority of their white brethren, and how many men were killed during the struggle? Following the precedent of the United States, we therefore assert that the civilized Filipinos, constituting to-day a larger majority over their uncivilized compatriots than did the Americans over the Indians and the negroes when the United States freed itself from England, have a perfect right to ask that an independent government be granted them irrespective of the presence of these elements in the population, and that they be intrusted with the power to govern the noncivilized people in the Philippines.

THE FILIPINOS CAN GOVERN THE UNCIVILIZED POPULATION.

But are the Filipinos strong enough to govern the uncivilized population of the islands? We say we are. Our assertion is fully justified by the superiority in numbers as well as in civilization of the Christian Filipinos. Moreover, we affirm that the noncivilized Filipinos will more readly accept the authorty of a Philippine independent government than that of their present rulers. I have told you that these uncivilized people have already, during the eight months of the Philippine de facto independent government, recognized the authority of that government. There is, moreover, the tie of blood between the civilized and the uncivilized Filipino which does not exist between either of them, on the one hand, and the Americans on the other, and which will make the control of the former easier than that of the latter.

THE FILIPINOS UNANIMOUS IN FAVOR OF INDEPENDENCE.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] read as an introduction to his remarks a letter which he says was written by a prominent local official of Ormoc, island of Leyte, in which it is asserted that the abandonment of the Philippines by the United States will be disastrous to the Filipinos. The name of the writer is not given, nor is it stated whether he is a Filipino or an American; but if he be a Filipino I do not understand how the opinion of one man, against that of the rest of his compatriots, can have any weight whatever. The Filipinos are united in their belief that they are capable of self-government. They are also united in their constant representation to the American people that they should be given independence. The Philippine Assembly, a body which stands for the whole population of the archipelago, has at every session since it was organized passed unanimous resolutions urging Congress to grant the islands independence, on the ground that the people are capable of administering their own affairs and eager to do so. In every municipality of the archipelago, at public meetings, the Philippine independence bill now pending before the House has been indorsed. In the city of Manila a mass meeting was held on May 30, 1912, wherein a committee of men representing all walks of life was appointed to draw such a resolution, which later was unanimously approved by the meeting, and whose wording is as follows:

Resolution sustaining the Jones bill and petitioning the Congress of the United States for its passage, maintaining that it is the general sense of the Filipino people and protesting against utterances made in favor of the definite retention of the Philippines by the United States.

Whereas on March 20, 1912, Representative JONES, of Virginia, introduced into the House of Representatives of the United States a bill "To establish a qualified independent government for the Philippines and to fix the date when such qualified independence shall become absolute and complete, and for other purposes"; and by cable it has been made known that this bill has been favorably reported by the Committee on Insular Affairs of that House; and

Whereas this bill, popularly known as the Jones bill, has been received with unanimous approbation by the Philippine public, numerous manifestations of approval from all classes of associations and other Philippine bodies having been constantly received and published by the press since its introduction in the House; and

Whereas the terms of said bill meet all the divers political tendencies in the islands and substantially recognize the ideals of the Filipino people and at the same time provide for internal and external security in whatever concerns international agreements which the United States Government could or might enter into concerning the Philippines; and

Whereas the National Party, the great Nationalist Party, and the Popular Nationalist League have positively and unmistakably expressed, directly or through their newspapers, their most enthusiastic approval of the Jones bill, applauding and commending it to the Filipino people as, if not as the political victory to which they are entitled, at least the most liberal measure which can be possibly gained under the present circumstances; and

Whereas the Filipino people have been constantly struggling for and advocating the independence of the islands, considering themselves in a position to assume the responsibilities of an independent government, being an educated and progressive people, capable of establishing and maintaining law and order and of respecting the rights of both subjects and aliens; and

Whereas it is most necessary that an express, categorical, and solemn declaration be made to the effect that it is the sense and desire of the people of these islands that there should be established a popular government, whose control shall be exercised by the Filipino people, thus opposing the utterances of certain elements who, professing to be supporters of Mr. Roosevelt as a candidate for the Presidency, have maintained that the American people and the American Government should frankly declare their object in the islands as a guaranty for the interests established here, denying all intention of granting independence to the Filipinos, upon the pretext that they are not yet prepared for it and that a portion of them are against it: Therefore be it

Resolved, That all those present in this meeting express, and do hereby express, their acceptance of all parts of the Jones bill providing for the establishment of a qualified independent government for the Philippines and that the Congress of the United States be respectfully requested to pass the bill as the formula that embraces the highest ideals of the Filipino people and safeguards all interests; and be it further

Resolved, To protest with all due respect against the utterances of those friends and supporters of Mr. Roosevelt who advocate the retention of the Philippines by the United States as a most unjust demand on the part of the American people and as opposed to the interests of both peoples; and be it also

Resolved, To express the appreciation and gratitude of the Filipinos to Representative JONES and to the Anti-imperialist League of Boston for their meritorious labors in favor of the interests of the Philippines, and to Delegate QUEZON for his unceasing efforts in defense of Filipino ideals; and be it further

Resolved, finally, To send cablegrams to Representative JONES, to the Anti-imperialist League of Boston, and to Delegates QUEZON and LEGARDA, requesting them to transmit these cablegrams to the House of Representatives, and to send copies of the same to the newspapers of the city of Manila.

The resolution as thus set forth was framed by a committee selected at the meeting which passed it and composed of the following members:

Mr. Teodoro R. Yangco, representing the bankers and merchants; Mr. Cecilio Lopez, representing the manufacturers; Mr. Mauro Prieto, representing the property owners and capitalists; Dr. Isidoro Santos, representing the professional classes; Hon. Maximo Mina, representing the Nationalist Party; Dr. Santiago Barcelona, representing the Popular Nationalist League; Dr. Alejandro Albert, representing the Progressist Party; Mr. Martin Ocampo, representing the native press; Mr. Hermenegildo Cruz, representing the labor unions; Mr. Francisco Arellano, representing the Philippine youth.

NATIVE CLERGY WANT INDEPENDENCE.

The native priests of the islands, upon the occasion of the election of Gov. Wilson as President of the United States, sent me the following communication:

POLO, BULACAN, P. I., November 12, 1912.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, Filipino Roman Catholic priests, in a fraternal meeting at Polo, Bulacan, send you our most cordial greetings. We respectfully request that you extend to the Hon. Woodrow Wilson our hearty congratulations on his election as President of the United States and our fervent hopes that his administration may bring to the islands a government for and by the Filipinos.

Very respectfully,

M. Sevilla, parish priest of Hagonoy; Juan de la Rosa, Rizal, P. I.; Arcadio Resurrección, parish priest of Meycauayan, Rizal; Francisco Alto, parish priest of Guiguinto; Bonifacio de la Cruz, parish priest of Rigoa; Juan Somera, parish priest of Paombong; Vicente Pingol, parish priest of Pulilan; Osmundo Lim, parish priest of Barasoain; Juan Dilag, parish priest of Obando; Esteban Daez, parish priest of Polo; Alejandro Carlos, parish priest of Marilao; Ladislao Santos, parish priest of Cuenca; Cipriano Aguirre, parish priest of Bocawe; Francisco Carreon, parish priest of Tonsuya; Tomás Changko, parish priest of Norzagaray; Aquilino Borlongan, parish priest of Calumpit; Mateo Evangelista, parish priest of Bulacan; Benito Cebrero, parish priest of Baliuag; Victorino Lopez, parish priest of Quinua; Cirilo Abela, parish priest of Santa Maria; Magdaleno Castillo, parish priest of Malolos; Angel Cortazar, parish priest of San Jose; Excequiel Morelos, parish priest of Bustos; Silvino Manalo, parish priest of Pandacan.

The views of the Filipino clergy are further explained by Rev. Silvino Manalo in the following words:

The reasons why the Filipino clergy favors the freedom of the Philippines are easily explained. Our history shows that we have been always in favor of a Filipino independent nationality. We believe that the interests of Christianity in the islands, which are the interests of all the civilized world and which are our main concerns, can be better protected under a Filipino independent government. We have, therefore, no greater desire than the liberty of our country—liberty which means the free and just management of our national and international affairs through the will and sovereignty of the people. Such a liberty is but the sequel of "independence," which is enjoyed by most peoples of the world.

We extend our sincere and enthusiastic congratulations to the Hon. Woodrow Wilson, because we believe that, being a man of sound democratic doctrines and a world-known lover of justice, he would do all he can to convert into law the Jones bill and thus insure to us the right which is justly and inalienably ours.

That there may be one or two Filipinos for American rule is not impossible; but should the voice of one man or of a dozen men in favor of American domination be heeded? Have gentlemen forgotten that when the thirteen Colonies were struggling for freedom from Great Britain, sacrificing for the independence of their country everything they cared most for in this world, there were a few Americans who took sides with the English? Have gentlemen forgotten that there were those who in the history of that war of revolution were known to be Tories?

ASSEMBLY BILL NO. 395.

One part of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] has given me a great deal of concern and sorrow. The gentleman alluded to a certain bill passed by the Philippine Assembly in a manner which must be construed as reflecting upon the character of the members of the assembly and the Filipinos in general. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania is too gentle and honorable a man to have willfully done so. I wish to use his own words that I may not misrepresent him in any way. He said:

As an instance of one of these bills, here is assembly bill No. 395, which passed the lower house December 27, 1910, but was laid on the table in the upper branch January 31, 1911, after the presentation of a report of the proper committee showing the object and effect of the bill. I will print that report, together with a translation of the legal terms used. The effect of the bill, as explained by the committee, would have been to allow many persons guilty of rape and certain other specified offenses to go unpunished. Such crimes were to be considered and dealt with as offenses against the victim, who might or might not institute proceedings, but not as public offenses or offenses against society.

Is the gentleman from Virginia willing—would any gentleman be willing—to have that most horrible of offenses no longer subject to public prosecution? Should Filipino women be placed in that position? Was the passage of such an act through the lower branch a very high tribute to their capacity for self-government?

The accusation thus made against the Philippine Assembly, and in fact against the whole Filipino people, is so unjustified and undeserved that I tried then to interrupt the gentleman from Pennsylvania to explain to him the circumstances upon which this bill is founded, but, owing to lack of time, he was not able to yield the floor.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania was asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] the circumstances relating to the bill, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania answered that he did not know them. He said that he knew that "the bill was passed by the lower branch, and that is enough." It is not enough. The gentleman from Pennsylvania before making a statement that, at least, by innuendo indicted the Philippine Assembly of being unmindful of the honor of Filipino women, should have devoted more time to the study of the measure which he criticizes. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, before accusing the representatives of the Filipino people of permitting rape, one of the most horrifying crimes, to go unpunished, should have made himself thoroughly acquainted with the subject.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania is known and considered to be one of the great lawyers not only of Congress but of the United States as well. I wonder, therefore, how this gentleman could have been ignorant of the fact that the law which he criticizes was not intended to allow any man guilty of rape to go unpunished, nor was it an original invention of the Philippine Assembly. I shall print the bill in connection with my remarks and invite the attention and study of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to it. This bill merely purported to repeal section 463 and to reenact sections 448 and 467 of the penal code of the Philippine Islands, which were amended by act 1773 of the Philippine Commission. The penal code of the Philippines is still the criminal law of the land except as it has been specifically amended by the acts of the commission or the legislature. This code is the same as the Spanish penal code, and is almost identical to the French, Austrian, Napolitan, and Brazilian codes. Section 448 of the Philippine penal code corresponds to section 463 of the Spanish penal code and is similar to sections 337 and 338 of the French penal code; section 247, second part, of the Austrian code; sections 326 and 327 of the Napolitan code; and section 250 of the Brazilian code.

Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania mean that the legislative bodies of every one of these countries proposes to allow men guilty of rape to go unpunished? Does he mean to assert that the legislators of those countries propose to leave their women unprotected when assailed?

Surely the gentleman could not have meant to draw such an indictment against the legislators of countries which are amongst the most advanced nations of the world in civilization and in the science of legislation.

The bill which the gentleman from Pennsylvania criticizes, like the dispositions in this respect of the French, Austrian, Spanish, Italian, and Brazilian codes, is framed upon an altogether different theory and purpose from that which the gentleman thinks underlie it. They are based on the theory that the crimes of seduction, abduction, rape, adultery, and so forth, involve the dishonor of the person and of the family offended; or, in other words, to the belief which exists the world over that a woman loses her honor, and with her's her people's, if she has had, even unwillingly, illegitimate intercourse with a man. The purpose of the bill is to give, in these cases, to the offended parties ample liberty to choose whether they would rather keep to themselves their disgrace or make it known to the public by the prosecution of the crime. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania is very much mistaken when he asserts that rape by virtue of this bill is not subject to public prosecution.

Paragraph 3 of section 1 of the assembly's bill says:

In order to proceed in case of rape and in those of abduction committed with unchaste design the denunciation of the interested party, of her parents, grandparents, or guardians shall suffice, even though they do not present a formal petition to the judge.

The construction of this paragraph, familiar even to law students in the countries where similar provision exists, is that the Government shall institute criminal proceedings as soon as it is advised of the facts, even orally, by any of the parties mentioned.

While the bill passed by the Philippine Assembly may not be in accord with the legal views of the gentleman from Pennsylvania or his own personal opinion, it is not by any means an indication of the inability or ignorance of the members of the Philippine Assembly. Much less does it indicate any lack of proper sense of morality in the people of the Philippine Islands.

MORALITY IN THE PHILIPPINES.

It is interesting to cite in connection with this matter the statements of the census in Volume II, page 117:

The number of women who reported themselves prostitutes was 476, nearly all of whom were in Manila. Of these, 75 were white, nearly all the countries of Europe being represented besides the United States; 260, or more than half, were yellow, practically all of whom were Japanese; and only 141, or 1 in 25,000 of the female population of the islands, were Filipinos. It is rather extraordinary that in this Malay archipelago seven-tenths of all the prostitutes were from foreign lands, a fact which speaks volumes for the chastity of the Filipinos.

This American-made book pays the highest possible tribute to the morality of the people of the Philippines, and is a final answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

LEGISLATIVE MISTAKES MADE EVERYWHERE.

But even admitting that the assembly had passed some unwise legislation, is that to be considered a conclusive proof of the incapacity of the Filipinos for self-government? Shall it be held a ground for denying them their God-given right to independence? How many of the legislatures of the different States of the Union, including the National Congress, have made mistakes in their legislative policies? Is there any legislature, whether in Europe, America, or Asia, free from mistakes? If I were to cite instances, I could convict every country on earth of lack of ability for self-government. The legislative record of the assembly is indeed most extraordinary if, after four regular and three extra sessions, its critics have found but two bills to criticize out of hundreds passed, and even when in those instances I have shown that the criticism is unwarranted.

INDEPENDENCE SHOULD BE GRANTED AS A MATTER OF JUSTICE.

I have dwelt at length on every subject touched upon by both the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New York. I have, I think, demonstrated that their arguments against Philippine independence are baseless. There is, in fact, no reason for withholding the exercise of the sacred right of self-government from the Filipinos unless it be the determination to deprive them of that right. We have given in every case, when we have been afforded the opportunity, proof that we know how to manage our own affairs, and that we can do it better than anybody can do it for us.

We do not seek the pity of the American people. We ask no favor from them. We only want them to comply with the divine rule, "Do unto others what you would that others should do unto you." The gentleman from New York, in his generosity, repeated in the beginning of his remarks what he once told me, that he sought for his people no freedom that he does not want for my people. If he means what he says, how can he countenance the continuation in the Philippines of American sovereignty for a single day against the will of the inhabitants when he certainly does not intend to permit his own country to be governed by a foreign nation for one minute? He desires that the Filipinos shall be as free as the Americans. And yet we are not as free as the Americans are. We do not enjoy the same privileges and the same political rights that they do. They have their own flag. We have none. They have their own Government, administered by men of their race and their selection. We have not. And all that we need to be on the same footing with them is that the gentleman from New York and all his colleagues in the House of Representatives and in the Senate vote for a bill granting independence to the Philippine Islands. [Applause.]

The following is the document referred to in the foregoing remarks:

(Introduced by the committee on revision of laws on Dec. 16, 1910. In substitution for A. B. No. 254, of Delegate Acuna; and considered and passed by the house on Dec. 27, 1910.)

An act amending act No. 1773, entitled "An act to provide for the public prosecution of the crimes of adulterio, estupro, rapto, violacion, calumnia, and injuria, to abolish the right of pardon by the aggrieved party in such cases, to provide for a special civil action for damages therein, and for other purposes," restoring with amendments certain provisions of the penal code of the Philippine Islands on this subject.

By authority of the United States, be it enacted by the Philippine Legislature, that—

SECTION 1. Article 448 of the Penal Code of the Philippine Islands is hereby amended to read as follows:

"ART. 448. Criminal proceedings for seduction can only be instituted on the complaint of the offended person or her parents, grandparents, or guardian.

"In order to proceed in cases of rape and in those of abduction committed with unchaste design, the denunciation of the interested party, of her parents, grandparents, or guardians, shall suffice even though they do not present a formal petition to the judge.

"If the person injured should, by reason of her age or mental condition, lack the requisite personality to appear in court, and should, besides, be wholly unprotected, not having parents, grandparents, brothers, or guardian of person or property to denounce the crime, the fiscal may do so, acting on the strength of public rumor.

"In all the cases of this article the express or implied pardon of the offended party shall extinguish penal action or the penalty if it should have been already imposed on the culprit.

"The pardon shall never be presumed, except by the marriage of the offended party with the offender.

"Nevertheless, when the culprit is a public official, this article shall not apply, except in the event of the marriage of the offended person with the offender, with regard to whom the existing provisions for cases of public offenses shall prevail in their entirety."

SEC. 2. Article 463 of the said Penal Code of the Philippine Islands is hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. Article 467 of the same code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"ART. 467. No one shall be punished for calumny or contumely unless on complaint of the offended party, except as provided in Title III, Chapter V, of this book.

"For the purposes of the three chapters of this title an offended party shall be considered not only the individual but also any other moral or judicial person legally authorized and represented.

"A person guilty of calumny or contumely against individuals shall be relieved from the penalty imposed by the pardon of the offended party."

SEC. 4. Sections 1, 2, and 4 of act No. 1773 of the Philippine Commission, and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. The public good requiring the speedy enactment of this bill, the same shall take effect on its passage, in accordance with section 1 of act No. 1945 of the Philippine Legislature.

Enacted.

I hereby certify that the foregoing bill was passed by the assembly on December 27, 1910.

RAMON DIOKNO,
Secretary Philippine Assembly.
